The second one-act, The Tiger also deals with a pair of frustrated lovers, but in wholly different circumstances. This play, more a comedy than the first, relates the story of Ben, an insane intellectual who kidnaps a Long Island housewife for his diabolical purposes. Alternating between fits of infantile behavior, grandiose delusions of his primitive physical strength, and paranoia, Whitebook does an excellent job portraying the crazed man. Gloria, his victim, at first appears terrifically frightened by her plight but soon begins to enjoy herself as she joins her captor in berating today's impersonal, unindividualistic society in which people are "sheep, millions of sheep." Through Gloria's logical manipulations, deftly acted by Bernstein, Ben recovers from his temporary psychotic spell and appears to be merely an overly sensitive man, bitter about his failure to be accepted into college. No longer talking wildly that it is "natural for a tiger to stalk his prey, in this case a female bird-brain," Ben allows his victim to leave of her own accord, promising to meet again the next week despite her children and boring, executive husband. This, of course, after a mutual seduction scene while Gloria is tutoring Ben in French to help him pass his exams. The change in the characters is once again wrought so subtly that it must be concluded that Bernstein and Whitebook are indeed a finely tuned, harmonious acting team.

The City Company of Vermont Theatre Troupe, directed by UVM graduate Betty Smith, had performances of The Typists and The Tiger every evening through October 27 at the City Hall Auditorium in downtown Burlington.

Harlem Dance Miracles

by Barbara MacFarlane

At the Death of a hero, singers write songs, poets write poems, writers write autobiographys, and dancers dance. And so, from the death of Martin Luther King came the Birth of Arthur Mitchell's Dance Theater of Harlem, a black ballet troupe. On October 22, the Lane Series presented the Dance Theater, and Burlington received them with a standing ovation for a variety of reasons.

The finished product of these artists' work was all Burlington saw that night. So I will present some history of where they came from. Over 10 years ago, Arthur Mitchell realized; through what Martin Luther King had accomplished, that the black people needed their own identity or self-awareness. Mitchell is an accomplished dancer who had traveled with the John Butler Company, had performed at the Newport Jazz Festival, and with Eartha Kitt, and was the lead dancer for the New York City Ballet. He is known as the "Balanchine of South America", Balanchine being the creator of the Nutcracker Suite. Along with Karel Shook, he opened a dance workshop in the attic of a warehouse in Harlem. He was situated in the middle of one of the worst drug and high crime areas in New York, but he realized Harlem was the black man's focal point in New York, perhaps in America. Children, mostly males, started coming in, all of them 9 years or older. The usual starting age for dancers is 2 or 3 years younger, so Mitchell told them they would have to work extra hard to reach the earlier starters' level at the same time, thinking this was impossible but a good device to make them work harder. Amazingly enough, they did it, and this trait stayed with them until maturity. They had established a permanent identity in less than 10 years, something that took the New York City Ballet over twenty years to accomplish. Mitchell realized that to succeed in the Harlem atmosphere one needs to be more than dedicated; you have to be a martyr. The culture of the black people was resting on their shoulder, and the Dance Theater of Harlem had to prove to the ignorant and opinioned public that the black dancer does not only belong in modern and jazz dancing, but in classical ballet as well.

At their appearance in Burlington, they conducted a series of workshops for 2 days, and performed on the 22nd. The program consisted of the "Allegro Brillante", "Every Now and Then", "Le Corsaire", and "Dougla". All numbers were received with profuse applause, mostly "Le Corsaire," a Pas de Deux by Elana Carter and Paul Russell.

The "Allegro Brillante" was choreographed by George Balanchine, and was an extremely intricate, and full number, covering as much classical movement as is possible in the designated time and space. The company seemed a bit uneasy at first, and the dance itself is almost too perfect and restricting for the performers' abilities. It was however, a fitting introduction to the company's ability and versatility. The "Allegro Brillante" also introduced Virginia Johnson and Paul Russell, the two most accomplished performers. Virginia Johnson is the prima ballerina of the troupe, a tall, sensual woman with a classic face whose every move was effortless. She is amazing to watch even in her simplest movements because she is so perfect. Paul Russell, her partner, is the man whose style closely resembles Mitchell's. He is known as the Nijinsky for the black culture, and his leaps were the highest and most graceful of the troupe's. Russell's strength and energy, pure energy, reaches the audience in an electrifying way. Johnson and Russell dancing together is one of the best examples of ability, grace, and personalized classicism available in ballet today. Not acknowledging these two as among the top twenty classical ballet dancers in the world today would be a severe oversight.

The next number, "Every Now and Then" was a bluesy, jazzy, funky, combination of ballet and modern dance. The music was by Quincy Jones, and the choreography by William Scott, a dancer that has been with the troupe since its creation. It was the most sensual number of the program, connoting images of street tough love games, but fluid instead of menacing. Sheila Rohan and Homer Bryant received laughter and applause in their silent "pursuit- rejection-conquest" love games. There was an aura of tension surrounding the number, like being in a dream where everything is in slow, even movement, yet waiting to explode.

"Le Corsaire", a Pas de Deux between Elena Carter and Paul Russell, was the most well received number, greeted by almost consistent applause. The lifts, jetes, and compatable grace of these two dancers was exemplified by the jubilance of both audience and dancer. It was pure ballet, something I think the audience was waiting for and something the children of the audience were definitely waiting for; an eight year old sitting next to me kept asking his mother if the leaps and lifts were real. The rest of the audience felt this too, and clapped in amazement of what the human body is capable of.

The last number, "Dougla", is described as a marriage between the Hindu and African cultures. This was not as well received as the rest of the numbers, perhaps due to the length. There were five parts, forming the introduction to the Dougla people, the wedding procession, the marriage, and a celebration. The fact that it was not ballet as the white culture would like to think of ballet, might have also affected its popularity. It was, however, an extremely intricate and ornate number, and the acrobatics drew applause from the crowd. It was composed and choreographed by Geoffrey Holder, the Broadway genius and creator of "The Wiz", a black version of "The Wizard of Oz." "Dougla" is not his best work, nor was it the company's best work according to the audience, whose expectations, I feel, restricted their enjoyment of it.

The workers behind the scenes should also be applauded because without them the show would not go on. Thank you Zelda Wynn, costume design; Gary Fells, lighting; and the Ford Foundation and Gimbels, for donations to start the Dance Theater of Harlem. Specifically, thank you Dance Theater of Harlem and Arthur Mitchell for bringing your miracles to Burlington.

One Act Auditions Begin Thursday

Casting for one acts begins at the Royall Tyler Theatre this Thursday, October 30th. Each semester, members of the directing class direct a one act play for a final project, which is then produced at the end of the semester. Each one act is entirely a student effort, incorporating the lighting, scene design, stagecraft and costume construction classes as well as directing. Seven plays will be produced this semester, five of which are casting this week-end.

The one acts provide a marvellous opportunity for those interested in theatre, but without the time which must be allotted for a major production. Also, those who wish to pick up a bit more experience before the next major production auditions will find the one acts a thorough introduction to the Royall Tyler. A total of eighteen actors will be cast (twelve men and six women) in the five plays, offering a tremendous variety of roles.

The following is a list of the five plays and the audition times: Mark Medoff's Doing a Good One for The Red Man, requiring two men and one women, will audition on Thursday, October 30th, from 4-7 p.m. and Friday, October 31st, from 5-7 p.m. Jason Miller's Lou Gehrig Did Not Die of Cancer, which requires two men and one woman, will follow the audition schedule listed above as well. The audition rooms within the theatre will be designated on the blackboard in the lower lobby before tryouts.

On Friday, October 31st, from 5-7 and Saturday, November 1st, from 1-3 p.m., N.F. Simpson's A Resounding Tinkle, with a cast of two women and one man, Tom Stoppard's After Magritte, also with a cast of two women and one man, and Arthur Kopit's The Day the Whores Came Out to Play Tennis, with a cast of six men, will hold tryouts in the theatre.

Scripts for all five plays are available now in the business office for your perusal. Auditions are open to all, and everyone is welcome to try out for as many of the plays as he chooses, with the understanding that the directors will have the final say concerning which play in which he is cast. All five plays are comedies, varying greatly in style and content, and all five directors are anxious, eagerly awaiting audition dates and the new faces they all hope to see at one acts this semester.

The One Man Show -CHISMO

David Schein – One Man Show CHISMO at the Royall Tyler Theatre, 9:00, Thursday October 30, 1975

On the evening of Thursday October 30, the Department of Communications and Theatre will present CHISMO, a one man show by David Schein. CHISMO has been performed for nine months in Berkeley California, and has been described as a "jazz piece of underground theatre about love and maleness." A short "intermissionary retrospective," TRUNK 15, will also be performed by Robert Ernest.

Mr. Schein, a native of Burlington, began his performing career at Burlington High School. He has since performed with the University of Iowa, Catholic University Players, the Champlain Shakespeare Festival, The Willis Ward Dance Co., The Rockefeller Center for the New Performing Arts, and among others has managed and directed in the Province of Quebec, on a grant from the Canadian Government.

Since 1973, Mr. Schein has been a resident of Berkeley, California where he has worked as a member of the Blake Street Hawkeyes Theatre Co. as a solo performer and teacher of "Techniques of Experimental Theatre."

The performances of CHISMO and TRUNK 15 will be at the Royall Tyler Theatre on Thursday, October 30. Donations will be taken at the door. For more information, call 656-2095 or stop by at the Royall Tyler.

Miniature Ballerinas Watch Harlem Dance

by Sari Bodi

"Your body is like a musical instrument and it must be kept well-tuned," said Arthur Mitchell, director of the Dance Theater of Harlem as he began the Lecture-Demonstration at Memorial Auditorium on October 21.

With a half-full auditorium of eager youngsters watching intently, Mitchell continued to say that experience in classical ballet is the strongest technical base for all kinds of dance. "But you have to practice," he said to the would-be ballerinas. "Dance is 40% talent and the rest is hard, hard work. 5-8 hours a day, 5-6 days a week is the usual time dancers practice."

To demonstrate the foundation of classical ballet, the energetic Mitchell began with the five positions. Standing with feet turned out, he compared first position to the stance Charlie Chaplin made famous. "Like Charlie Chaplin, we use this broad base to work from."

With feet further apart for second position, he said that the principles of fencing center around it. First advancing in standard fencing style, he then demonstrated it in awkward pigeon-toed manner, exemplifying how necessary the second position principle is.

For the other three positions, the curtains were opened and Mitchell introduced the ten men and women of the Harlem Dance Company. The twenty navy and light blue leotarded figures stood at the barre and demonstrated the plie, gran and demi, in the various positions. Their bodies gracefully descended and rose in time to piano music and Mitchell's rhythmic clicking of his lecture stick to the floor.

"How many have a cat?" said Mitchell. "How many have a friend who has one? How many have seen one? It doesn't thud when it leaps. It rolls to the floor, cushioning the impact." He exhibited the cat's agile leap and then with roving head motions showed a jazz/version of the feline's walk.

Extensions came next. As he helped one ballerina stretch her leg to her head, he said, "It's not like you say, 'I'm going to lift my leg up and touch my head.' It takes practice to stretch the muscles."

Mitchell explained ron des jambes in terms of a snake. The dancers' feet darted out in front and circled around in the manner in which a snake attacks suddenly and then will wriggle around until the second sharp movement.

Mitchell split his group of dancers up and began with the point class for the girls. As two girls danced on their toes, he explained that this strenuous action can wear out two to three pairs of the delicate shoes in one performance.

The next class, the dajio class, brought the boys back on stage. Here the boys learn how to balance the girls as they pirouette. One boy lightly caught a ballerina after she had spun around seven times. Mitchell explained that the boys' timing must be exact as they demonstrated gran lifts. One ballerina was lifted high over her partner's head as he walked across the stage. Another was plucked out of the air as she lept forward.

For the finale, Mitchell said they had combined the basic ABC's of ballet in the demonstrations of four styles of dance. The first was a flowing piece done in the classical style. The second was the more modern, neo-classical style. The dancers looked like mechanized statues as they moved with precise motions.

The next was an African or ethnic dance which employed a movement, a ripple of the spine, James Brown made famous. With bells around their ankles, four of the boys incorporated this movement into a frenzied dance. The last dance combined aspects from the other three styles. Mitchell called this a totally American style, using an abstract version of a ritual as its theme. The rhythm began with a single drum beat. The high priestess stood at the core of the procession and the other dancers wove around her until the final effect resembled a caterpillar.

If anyone was wondering if the lecture-demonstration had any effect on the future ballerinas, he should have been outside of Memorial Auditorium after the demonstration to see the miniature ballerinas leaping and pirouetting down the street.

(CPS) – College students are an unhappy, cynical alienated bunch of people, with no respect for institutions, little belief in God and the "lowest morals," if George Gallup statistics have correctly gauged the mood of the nation's campuses.

A recent Gallup survey showed that while most students lean to the left politically, the minority of students who "take a center or right of center position" on political issues are also those who have "the greatest confidence in the nation and its institutions, respect for religion, and their own family life."

The poll does not include, however, freshmen statistics for those students who are not seniors, nor does it take into account that political, social and economic conditions were very different four years ago when those students were freshmen.

Old Laws Never Die

(CPS) – Like old soldiers, old laws don't die, they just fade out of the public mind. But old laws regulating blue sales still exist in yellowing sections of the law books in many states.

For instance, it's still against the law for a Nebraska tavern owner to sell beer unless there is a pot of soup brewing.

In Kansas, an old law forbids eating rattlesnake meat in public.

Carrying an ice cream cone in your pocket is still forbidden by a Lexington, KY ordinance, while in Winter Lake, IN just eating an ice cream cone at a counter on Sunday is illegal.

English Department Offers Gay Lit Course

More and more schools across the country are incorporating Gay Studies programs into their courses of instruction. This spring the University of Vermont will join those progressive institutions when Professor Ken Seid offers a course in Gay Literature under the auspices of the English department. In an interview written for the Cynic, Seid spoke openly about the course and Gay Liberation in general on campus.

Seid relates, "There has been a growing Gay awareness on our campus, beginning, I suspect, with the founding of the Gay Student Union in October, 1974. Unlike the University of New Hampshire, things went peacefully as the student body accepted this organization. Particularly indicative of an interest on behalf of the students to discuss the Gay experience has been the considerable number of requests to speak with classes this semester in human sexuality, sociology, education, early childhood and human development, and the medical school. Students are more open about discussing sexuality and especially alternative sexual preferences."

The course in Gay Literature, certainly unthinkable even a year ago, will be entitled English 196--Special Topics: Sexuality and Literature. Seid noted that the word "Gay" or "homosexual" in connection with the course will not appear anywhere on the student's transcript, thus protecting the students from any possible source of future difficulty with prospective employers, graduate or professional schools, or even parents. "If it were up to me, the course would have had a title something like The Homosexual Imagination or Gay Literature and Society, but that is really too unrealistic at this time." Seid went on to describe the course as one which will "focus on Gay literature, either by homosexual writers (both men and women) or about homosexuality, and will survey representative works drawn from all the genres beginning with Plato and Sappho and continuing up to contemporary times." Some of the imaginative literature to be studied includes works by Mann, Gide, Wilde, Williams, Stein, Colette, and Whitman. "Moreover," Seid continued, "When we deal with the non-fictional materials in the course, we shall be discuss' oppression and liberation of a minority group from several perspectives--historical, sociological, religious, anthropological, psychological, and political. In this respect, the course is in many ways a cross-departmental offering, for we shall try to be as wide in scope as possible and examine the Gay experience from an interdisciplinary approach."

Seid stressed that "the course would have value for students, whatever their sexual preference. It would be very unfortunate if 'straight' students thought that the course was designated primarily for Gay students, for the straight perspective surely will be needed. Really, one doesn't have to be a woman to be interested in Feminism or a Black to be committed to civil rights. It is regrettable that so few men, for example, sign up for such courses as Women in Society or Women in Literature. With Black Literature it is different, for we have a small Black population on campus and mostly whites sign up for that course."

Those students who may be interested in the course were advised to see the bulletin board outside the English department office for more information and also to see Seid personally to discuss the course in more detail (his office is 300 Old Mill).

Seid indicated that he thought the course would be a liberating experience and one which would be valuable in understanding a minority group which, up until recent times (the past six or seven years), had hardly been formally recognized by society. Seid wished to thank the English department and particularly Chairman Robert Cochran for being understanding and helpful concerning his efforts to develop and offer the course within the department. Seid commented that, "It won't be long until most colleges and universities all over the country will offer Gay Studies programs, much as they offer courses in Feminism, Black Studies, and Environmental Studies today." It is nice to know that the University of Vermont is one of the early schools to be offering this course of study.

VPIRG Establishes Priorities

Last Sunday, the Vermont Public Interest Research Group Board of Trustees established its project priorities for the coming months and next year's state legislative session. Those projects range from working towards a state-wide ban of flourocarbon-powered aerosol cans to halting the planned construction of Interstate 93 in eastern Vermont.

The VPIRG trustees, which include six UVM students, met for five and one half hours at Johnson State College and designed four general fields of public issues for the VPIRG staff to tackle. The four fields are consumer advocacy, health care planning with emphasis on preventive medicine, highway planning, and environmental protection including all aspects of energy use in Vermont. These four fields include over thirty specific projects, each of which was evaluated and then given a certain priority level by the trustees. For example, in the field of highway planning, the halting of I-93 received the highest priority. Other project titles in this field include Salting of Roads, Car Registration by Weight and Fuel Economy, Highway Environmental Impact Statements, Highway Safety, Winter Bare Roads Policy, Betterment of Existing Roads and Bicycles as Transportation. Each project in all four fields involves student volunteers with some projects being undertaken solely by students. Over fifty UVM students are presently active in VPIRG projects.

The VPIRG staff has evenly distributed the four fields of concern. Director Whitey Bluestein will head up the environmental and energy field, while staff members Peter Cobb and Carl Bohlen are in charge of health care planning and highway planning respectively. The field of consumer advocacy is distributed among all three staff persons. The trustees postponed VPIRG involvement in several low-priority projects due to staff reductions. Those projects will be picked up at a later date when the staff can be enlarged. The trustees did approve the hiring of Richard Groeshell on a short term basis to investigate the transportation of radioactive material within the state of Vermont.

The trustees voted to enlarge its board from twelve to fifteen members to include representation from three additional Vermont colleges. They are Windham College, Vermont Technical College and Marlboro College. Other colleges, besides UVM, which have trustees are Johnson State, Trinity, and Goddard.

It was decided on Sunday that VPIRG will take positions and lobby on a minimum of four state legislative bills this January. In summary, those bills deal with medical malpractice, developmental disability insurance, betterment of highways and a ban on flourocarbon-powered aerosols. Many respected scientists contend that flourocarbons, when released into the atmosphere, cause depletion of the ozone layer which results in an increase in the incidence of skin cancer. Oregon has recently banned the use of these aerosols and several other states are also striving for this ban.

VPIRG Criticizes State Health Officials

VPIRG Criticizes State Health Officials over Tumor Machine

The Vermont Public Interest Research Group (VPIRG) today charged that State Health Department officials are ignoring the citizen's health review process by pushing for the purchase of the Axial Tomography unit. The $400,000 unit, designed to diagnose tumors, has been opposed by the Comprehensive Health Planning office (CHP).

According to VPIRG spokesperson, Peter Cobb, Health Department officials are undermining the review process by working "behind the scenes" with hospital administrators who are trying to get the machine. The unit has been requested by officials at the Medical Center Hospital in Burlington.

"The issue, at this point, is not the cost of the machine," said Cobb, "but whether the State Health Department is willing to allow citizens to have a voice in the state's health planning." Cobb added that Health Department officials have met with their lawyers and with the hospital administrators in order to work out an arrangement to get the machine. The meetings were held prior to the scheduled fair hearing that the hospital had called for, in order to appeal the rejection by the state review board. "This is a mockery of the fair hearing process," said Cobb.

According to procedures set up under the Federal Social Security Act, all capital expenditures exceeding $100,000 by Vermont health care facilities must be approved by local and state review boards, after having been studied by CHP. CHP officials testified in a hearing before the State Health Board that the hospital officials had not provided evidence that the machine is necessary to improve the health standards of Vermonters.

"Vermont consumers will be paying thousands of dollars for another fancy machine of questionable value," said Cobb. The VPIRG staff member also criticized the increasing trend towards highly technical medical care. "As the machines get bigger and bigger," he added, "more and more people, whom the health establishment supposedly serves, refuse to trust the system."

Gallup Poll Captures True Spirit

by Allan Rabinowitz

(CPS) -- College students are an unhappy, cynical alienated bunch of people, with no respect for institutions, little belief in God and the "lowest morals," if George Gallup's statistics have correctly gauged the mood of the nation's campuses.

A recent Gallup survey showed that while most students lean to the left politically, the minority of students who "take a center or right of center position" on political issues are also those who have "the greatest confidence in the nation and its institutions, respect for religion, and their own family life."

The survey results, based on about 900 interviews with students from 57 colleges around the nation, indicated that most students move to the left in their political thinking during their four years of college. While 30% of the freshmen polled said they leaned to "left of center or far left," 53% of the seniors said they identified with the left to some degree. Only 20% of the seniors said their ideas went to the right of center or far right.

The poll does not include, however, freshmen statistics for those students who are now seniors, nor does it take into account that political, social and economic conditions were very different four years ago when those students were freshmen.

The survey compared one Ivy League university (which was not named) and Oklahoma Christian College (OCC) with each other and with college students in general. The OCC students tended to take the opposite view from the majority of college students around the country on almost every major issue, while the Ivy League students leaned toward the other extreme of the national results: they felt the same on most issues as the nation's students in general, but in significantly larger proportions.

The following are some survey results on the moral and political attitudes of college students in general, and at Oklahoma Christian College and an Ivy League school:

--54% of all college students favored the decriminalization of marijuana, while 68% of the Ivy League students favored it. OCC students opposed the measure by 90%.

--Only 18% of the nation's college students and 9% of the Ivy League students felt that pre-marital sex was wrong, while 83% of the OCC students were against pre-marital sex.

--65% of all college students and 83% of the Ivy League students supported the right of abortion under all circumstances. Only 24% of the OCC students took that stand.

...most students move to the left in their political thinking during their four years of college.

The survey indicated that most college students held a "strong anti-business" attitude. But, according to Gallup, this hostility is accompanied by a "shocking" ignorance of the free enterprise system. Gallup asserts that most students have a "distorted" view of big business, over-estimating profits and under-estimating corporate taxes.

"Why do students turn to the left?" asked Gallup in a summary of the survey's findings. He answered his own question by citing events of the recent past such as Vietnam, Watergate, and the economy--but emphasized the "great influence" of professors with leftist views.

Probing student religious attitudes, the survey showed that most students across the country believe in "God or a universal spirit," and that 65% of the students believe in life after death--though the statistics drew no distinction between reincarnation and traditional salvation.

Future Of Mortar Board In Question

This past weekend two hundred women from all over the country met in Kansas City, Missouri to discuss and vote on the future of the Mortar Board, a national senior womens honor society. One hundred sixty-seven universities were represented including University of Vermont's chapter president, Gail Mochan.

The conference was called in response to Title IX of the Educational Amendments of 1972, which states:

"No person...shall, on the basis of sex, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjugated to discrimination under any education program or activity receiving federal financial assistance."

The Mortar Board, which has been a single-sexed organization for fifty-seven years was therefore forced to take action if it wished continuous recognition and support by the universities.

The alternatives were as follows:

1. That Mortar Board, Inc., cease to exist as a national organization.
2. That Mortar Board, Inc., exist as a private honor society, separating itself from the institution and severing any formal affiliation or relationship with colleges and universities.
3. That membership criteria be altered in the Constitution and Bylaws to enable Mortar Board chapters to have male members.
4. That Mortar Board, Inc., consider a merger with a traditionally male honor society or honorary group.
5. Court action.

After exhausting all the alternatives the conference delegates voted 150 to 17 to alter the Mortar Board's Constitution and Bylaws by removing reference to sex of the candidate as a criterion for membership. The Mortar Board, despite its decision to admit men, will still focus its attention in promoting the status of women through leadership, scholarship and service.

Graduate Fellowships Offered

With the support of the Ford Foundation, the National Fellowships Fund is offering a limited number of graduate fellowships to Black Americans who intend to pursue a career in higher education. These fellowships are offered as part of a broader Ford Foundation program of assistance to historically disadvantaged minorities -- such as Black Americans -- whose opportunities for participation in higher education have been limited as the result of racial discrimination and/or other factors.

To be considered for one of these fellowships, applicants must meet all of the following qualifications: 1) They must be citizens of the United States. 2) They must be enrolled in or planning to enter an accredited US graduate school offering the doctoral degree in their field of study. 3) They must be currently engaged in or planning to enter a career in higher education.

Eligibility is limited to (a) applicants who plan to pursue full-time study toward the doctoral degree in the Arts & Sciences or (b) applicants who hold a first postbaccalaureate professional degree -- such as the M.D., J.D., or the masters in architecture, business administration, education, engineering, library science, public administration, public health, or urban affairs and planning -- and plan to continue on to the doctoral degree in preparation for a career in higher education.

These awards are for one year only, but they are renewable upon reapplication if the fellow maintains satisfactory progress toward the doctorate. The fellow will be expected to study full time and to complete the requirements for the doctorate as soon as possible.

Fellowship awards for 1976-77 will include the full tuition and fees required by the graduate school, an allowance of $300 for books and supplies, and a monthly stipend of $300 to help meet living costs. A married fellow may apply for an additional stipend of $50 a month for his or her spouse and each dependent child, provided that dependency can be substantiated. Applicants receiving Special Dissertation-Year awards may apply for a research allowance in lieu of the book allowance.

Twelve-month awards are available for applicants planning to study full time during the summer session 1976 and the academic year 1976-77, starting with July 1976. Ten-month awards are available for those planning to study full time during the academic year 1976-77, starting with September 1976.

All applicants are required to submit scores on the Graduate Record Examinations Aptitude Test and one Advanced Test. These tests will be administered on October 18 and December 13, 1975, and the deadlines for registering for them are September 22 and November 12, 1975, respectively.

Arrangements for taking the tests should be made by the applicant directly with the Graduate Record Examinations, Educational Testing Service, Box 955, Princeton, New Jersey 08540. Applicants should request that their scores be sent directly to "National Fellowships Fund, Code Number R5487-4."

The deadline for submitting completed applications and all supporting documents is January 5, 1976.

Applicants will be notified of award decisions on March 25, 1976.

Application forms must be requested by the individual applicants. No applications will be sent to intermediaries. For application forms and additional information write to: Graduate Fellowships for Black Americans, National Fellowships Fund, Suite 484, 795 Peachtree Street, N.E., Atlanta, Georgia 30308

This is the final year that graduating seniors may enter the competition.

The National Fellowships Fund is an agency of the Council of Southern Universities, Inc., operating under a grant from the Ford Foundation.

Omnipotent 'They' Challenged By Senate Committees

It is difficult to get through a day without running across the dissatisfied murmurings of a large number of students at UVM.

From the sounds of things, students are being oppressed by some almighty "they" force over which there is no control. "They are increasing tuition; they are adding new course requirements; they are making prices at the bookstore skyrocket; they are implementing ridiculous traffic violations; they are allowing dogs to run rampant; and they won't let my dog enjoy himself." We've all heard and maybe partaken in such conversations, in which we are the oppressed martyrs.

Some bright points do stand out. Every full-time undergraduate student at this University is a paid-in-full member of the Student Association. I hear more grumblings and Cynic pages turning at the mere mention of S.A., but try to see this article through.

The new S.A. Senate is just rounding out its second week of service, a diversified group of senators are learning more and more about the opportunities open to all of us, ways in which we can provide input concerning things that happen to us.

Positions are open to students on various committees. These committees are:

1. Faculty Senate Student Affairs Committee -- This committee needs students to work with them in solving student problems.
2. Military Studies Sub-Committee -- ? This sub-committee needs a non-ROTC student representative.
3. The Faculty Senate Financial Policy Committee -- This committee needs a student representative. This committee is especially important considering the budget crisis now at hand.
4. The Alumni Association -- is interested in working with students while they are on-campus.
5. The Traffic Board of Appeals -- This board, which reviews appeals of traffic violations, needs two voting student members.

There are many S.A. groups established or being established that need student input, such as S.A. Speakers, and Sex Information Service.

Off campus students have had complaints about landlords and apartments for a long time now. This year we want to gather information in hopes of providing assistance in guarding students against the pitfalls of off campus living. People have been coming to the S.A. Office in search of this service, we need you to make it work.

Yeah, it seems that everyone agrees that an evaluation of courses and professors by and for students is a wonderful idea. We need students now to start working on such a mammoth project, it will be less of a struggle in years to come.

If everyone could take just a quarter of the energy used in complaining, towards some productive purpose, changes of a positive nature would have to occur.

Please, take the time out to familiarize yourself with the S.A. Office. It is there for your use. Vacant typewriters and mimeograph machines are fair game to any S.A. member.

There comes a point where we must stop things we don't like, and stand up for the things we know to be just.

Anybody willing to get involved in any of the opportunities above, just stop in the S.A. Office for more information. Help is needed.

ETV Celebrates 8th Anniversary With Banquet

Thursday, October 16th, Vermont's Educational Television (ETV) celebrated its eighth anniversary with a gala fund-raising dinner that practically defined ambrosia. The dinner boasted the John Cassel Band, Italian food ala Saga, and a special guest appearance by the nationally reknown Italian cooking team, Franco and Margaret Romagnoli. The event was televised with a huge birthday cake officially opening the fund-raising at the Ethan Allen Studio. The event was highlighted, aside from all else, by the station's first color broadcast midway through the evening.

The meal was catered by Saga Food Service (don't stop reading!) and the food was delicious. The menu was strictly Italian, featuring chicken with real prosciuotto ham in a cheese sauce, mullet with black olives and capers, feticcini alla burro (flat noodles with a cream-n-butter-n-spices sauce), deep fried rice-n-cheese balls, hot vegetables, and a splendid antipesto table featuring marinated mushrooms, salad with olives, anis (licorice-like celery), raw zucchini, raw turnips, green peppers, cucumbers, carrots, celery, tuna fish, spicy salami, radishes, cauliflower, and, of course, a fresh oil and vinegar dressing flooded with red onion. The dinner was presented buffet style and desert, a dark chocolate layer cake, was served by smiling (yes, Smiling) waitresses. There were the festive cornucopias filled with real grapes and breads of all kinds. Saga really outdid themselves this time, and for good reason -- the Romagnoli's were watching.

Franco and Margaret Romagnoli have brought Italian cooking home to many kitchens across the country. Their cooking before the bright lights has brought them a great deal of attention, resulting in the publication of one cookbook, The Romagnoli's Table, another to come, and a well-fed television crew. As Margaret Romagnoli put it, "The real test is if the crew clears the table immediately." And cooking before the cameras is no easy task. When asked what their most embarrassing moment was, they jointly described the time when Margaret dropped a butcher knife, nearly cutting Franco's microphone cord. After putting down the pot holders she had been holding, she stooped down to tie her shoe (and retrieve the knife) and discovered that the pot holders were in flames where she had placed them on the stove. The entire evening "seemed to be filled with pitfalls!!" So much for experience...

The John Cassel Band with the Night Crawlers gave the best jazz piano performance this side of New York City. All in all, the food, entertainment, smiles and color TV anticipation made the event exciting. ETV certainly started out on the right foot this year, and there are hopes that their fund-raising efforts will be more successful than last year's. The programs offered have been of high quality and ETV maintains these standards. If you're interested in helping or finding out what programs are offered this season, write and request an ETV guide. It is published monthly by Vermont Educational Television and is available to viewers donating $15 or more annually. Publication offices are at the Vermont Educational Television studios in Winooski, Vermont 05404.

Student Action Committee

by Paul Ajamian

The newly formed Student Action Committee of the SA has started work on a wide variety of issues which will directly affect a wide cross-section of students at the University.

The first two meetings were spend drawing up a statement of purpose that will more clearly define the scope of the committee. According to this statement and the Constitution as well, the major function of the Student Action committee is to "consider matters concerning students and student interests, on the state, local, federal, and university levels." Consequently it will "recommend resolutions and actions to the Senate and General Assembly," who will then make decisions on the committee's proposals.

Specific topics of concern that are now or soon will be under investigation by the members of the Student Action Committee include a reinstatement of the Albatross, UVM's faculty-course evaluation system and

by Scott Curtis

Most Americans know the customs of Halloween, but few know its origins. This is because the customs have little continuity. For who can deduce what bonfires, jack o' lanterns, black cats, witches, devils, ghosts, trick-or-treating and mischief all commemorate on October 31st?

The name "Halloween" is a contraction of All Hallows Evening, which is the night before the Roman Catholic Church's All Saint's Day, originally on May 13. In 884, Pope Gregory changed the day to November 1st, because it was easier to feed hungry pilgrims after the harvest. In Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, October 31st was the Celtic-Druidic New Year. Jack O' Lantern Legend

by Scott Curtis

Most Americans know the customs of Halloween, but few know its origins. This is because the customs have little continuity. For who can deduce what bonfires, jack o' lanterns, black cats, witches, devils, ghosts, trick-or-treating and mischief all commemorate on October 31st?

The name "Halloween" is a contraction of All Hallow Evening, which is the night before the Roman Catholic Church's All Saint's Day, originally on May 13. In 884, Pope Gregory changed the day to November 1st, because it was easier to feed hungry pilgrims after the harvest. In Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, October 31st was the Celtic-Druidic New Year. The two traditions -- the Roman Catholic Church and the Druidic religion -- combined and produced the mongrel child whose descendant is our Halloween.

The Druid New Year celebrations make our rowdy holiday seem very tame. Druids believed that the sun left them in the winter because the Sun-God was angry with them. To appease the Sun-God, fires were built to rejuvenate the sun. (This pagan rite is ironic, since it gets cold in the winter and they needlessly burned their fuel in November.) These fires were also used for sacrifices. The Druid priest would burn horses and the town criminals to please the Sun-God. During the Middle Ages, it was customary to burn black cats (witches' helpers) in the bonfire. The Druids believed that reincarnated souls came alive during the night to be judged by the Lord of the Dead. Later, it became traditional that spirits awoke on this day. As a result, young people would play pranks and blame it on the fairies and ghosts.

The holiday went through many changes before the Irish made it popular in America beginning in 1840. The pagan rites had been given Christian rationales. The bonfires became fires to scare the witches and demons away. Trick-or-treating has a bizarre history. Children, dressed as deceased saints who dwelled in purgatory, would accept treats as payment for their fasting for a saint.

The jack o' lantern is a product of an old folk story. Jack tricked the devil into climbing a tree and then carved a cross on the tree, so the devil couldn't get down. Jack told the devil he would let him come down if the devil promised not to take him to Hell. The devil assented to the deal. But Jack didn't make it to heaven, so he tried to enter Hell. Of course, the devil couldn't let him in, because of his promise. As Jack was walking away from Hell, the devil threw a fiery coal at him. Jack placed the coal in his half-eaten turnip, to give his soul light in his search for a place to go. This old tale is the source of our modern jack o' lantern, a candle placed in a hollowed out pumpkin.

The American Halloween celebration incorporated only mild mischief in the 19th century. Around World War I, however, mischief became rampant. Since World War II, the holiday has become so destructive as to require police control. Lately, the pagan holiday has been bringing out some of the cruel and uncivilized aspects of people's behavior.

Straw Bodied Fawkes

by Mary Partridge

Every autumn pumpkin-headed, straw-bodied men sit on Vermont lawns and porches smiling, smoking corn-cob pipes and symbolizing what?

The origin of these effigies is generally unknown by their makers. "We've always had one," said an old man outside of Jeffersonville. "I don't know why."

It could be that these creatures are simply full-bodied jack-o-lanterns, or perhaps an imaginative end for scarecrows whose gardens have been harvested. But the most intriguing theory is that they are carry-overs from England's Guy Fawkes effigies.

Guy Fawkes attempted to blow up the parliament building and King James I on November 5, 1605. The "Gunpowder Plot," as it was called, was conceived by a group of Roman Catholics in England who were reacting against King James' anti-Catholic laws. Guy Fawkes, although born a Protestant, became a zealous Roman Catholic through his step-father's influence. He had a reputation for bravery and he was asked to carry out the plan.

The conspirators rented a house next to Parliament. Fawkes dug a tunnel from there into the cellar of the parliament building, where he concealed at least 20 barrels of gunpowder with iron bars placed on top of them to increase the impact. A fuse which gave Fawkes 15 minutes to escape was installed.

The plot was discovered, and on the evening of November 4th, the day before the explosion was to take place, Fawkes was arrested. His accomplices fled, but eventually all 13 conspirators were caught and executed. Falkes was hanged in January 1606.

In England, "guys" are burned in effigy with great celebration on November 5th. This tradition must have come over to America with the English settlers. The historical significance of the effigies has been lost through time, but the pumpkin-headed men remain.

Outing Scales Wall

by Wallace E. Goode

When you attempt anything, why bother to go halfway? Go for the highest and always for the top.

This is exactly what the UVM Outing Club did as they led a group of students up to Mt. Mansfield for the week-end.

In spite of overcast, the Club persisted. We arrived at the foot of Mansfield at about 11:30, lunches were quickly eaten and our assault began. Our ascent was gradual, but being from the flat Mid-West, I thought I was gonna die.

Once we reached the timber line, the wind picked up considerably. Upward we climbed and colder and windier it got. The cold and wind we could have taken but the addition of rain and sleet were too much.

On our first attempt, 400 feet from the top, we were forced to abandon our assault and to return to our shelters at the bottom.

Three hours later, when we had finally dried out, the smell of food cooked on an open fire, the ghost stories and all the fun of camping out had made up for our earlier failure. The Outing Club had planned to do some stargazing, weather permitting. Naturally the weather wasn't permitting, so we enjoyed each other, in the outdoors.

Six-thirty came early, thanks to our personal rooster, Beth Druoretzky. A quiet breakfast and we were off again. This time we aimed for Canterlever Rock. If you've been to this rock, you'll never forget it. If you've never seen it, be sure and do so.

From here we scaled a sheer rock wall and once on the top, realized that we couldn't go down the way we had come up, so higher and higher we went. From the top of this ridge we bushwhacked our way to the Sunset Ridge Trail and finally to the top.

Four Thousand three hundred ninety-three feet of view made all the effort, the pain and every single cut and bruise worth it. We were at the top of the Man and the view was magnificent.

Too often we take what is around us for granted. We assume that since it has been here, it always will be here. Coming from a large city like Chicago, I've learned the folly of the above logic. There is so much to be had around Vermont. I wonder if students utilize what they've been given.

I want to thank the UVM Outing Club for exposing a novice, like myself, to a part of Vermont. Not only was it a chance to get off campus for the weekend, but it also gave me the opportunity to meet students in a very unrushed environment.

Hats off to you, Outing Club. I wish you success in all your future outings.

On Top Of The World

by Judith A. Cowan

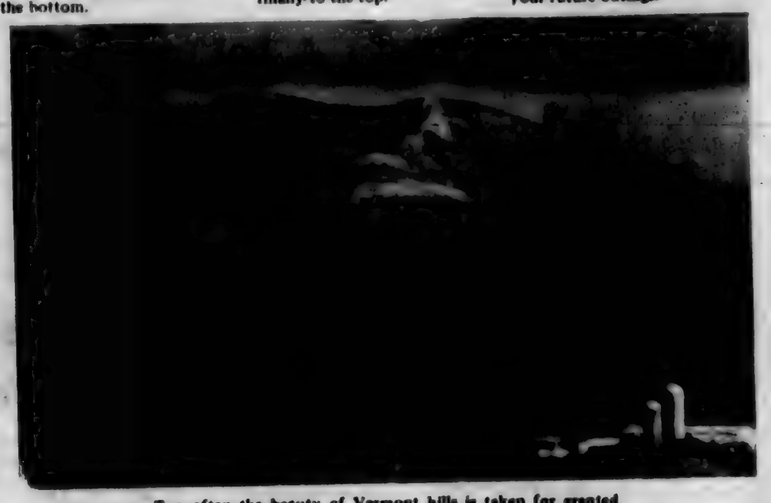
The first day was rainy and drab, but it didn't prevent the fantastic experiences that transpired...

To be on top of the world looking through a dense layer of clouds and knowing the feeling of man facing nature -- alone. This is what I felt climbing up Mount Mansfield.

A lesson to learn is that of the tremendous forces nature can exert. Wind was the factor with which I was contending. The continuous, tremendous, and even terrifying power an explosion of air can have is incredible. I was facing it, feeling it, fighting it. I felt the type of desperation in which I couldn't quite comprehend the forces facing me yet, but I know it was threatening and I had to use all my resources to protect myself from it.

The next day was as different from the first as the difference between horror and ecstacy. I was sitting on a rock, the sun soothing my body and the scenery soothing my mind. The feeling was one of complete profoundity. I was thrilled because I had just made a steep and difficult climb, and I was awed by the magnificence and magnitude of the view. I realized the enduring power nature has over the surroundings and the necessity of man to help preserve this power.

These are some of the emotions and experiences I had that weekend. The lesson I learned is to leave fear behind and move into the beauty of nature.



Too often the beauty of Vermont hills is taken for granted.

Who Is William Loeb?

Manchester, N.H. -- Who the Hell IS William Loeb? by Kevin Cash, the most comprehensive study yet undertaken of the newspapers of Manchester, N.H., and of their publisher, will be available for pre-publication sale in mid-November. The book is being published by Amoskeag Press, Inc., of Manchester.

Who The Hell IS William Loeb? traces the history of the Manchester newspapers from their founding to the present day. The volume includes detailed biographical sketches of Colonel Frank Knox and John A. Muehling, co-founders of the Manchester Evening Leader, as well as of William Loeb, Jr., who was secretary to President Theodore Roosevelt and who was father of the present publisher of the Manchester Union Leader and the New Hampshire Sunday News.

The majority of the 472 pages of Who the Hell IS William Loeb? is devoted to the life of William Loeb, III, the present publisher, and the reasons for the notoriety of the Manchester newspapers. The book's dust jacket describes Loeb as "an only child, the son of a self-made man of wealth, power and great ability, whose acknowledged magnetism and charm are too often outweighed by strange lapses of taste and judgment and even stranger lapses of personal conduct."

The book covers every phase of Loeb's professional and private life, from his privileged childhood years in Oyster Bay, N.Y., through two divorces, through his blistering attacks on U.S. Sen. Edmund Muskie in the 1972 N.H. Presidential primary, right up to his scathing denouncement of U.S. Sen. John Durkin during the hotly disputed New Hampshire Senatorial runoff election of September, 1975. It traces the history of Loeb's other newspaper properties, and tells of the demise of three newspapers under the Loeb management, as well as of Loeb's complex financial dealings.

The clothbound edition of Who the Hell IS William Loeb? will be available at major bookstores everywhere at $8.95. The publisher's original intention was to make this volume available for under five dollars, but rising production costs have made this impossible. Therefore, a special paperbound edition of the identical text will be available in most outlets where newspapers are sold at $4.95.

The author, Kevin Cash, is a native of Manchester, having received his early education in Manchester schools. A graduate of Brown University, where he was editor of the Brown Herald, he began his newspaper career as a high school correspondent and copy boy at the Union-Leader Publishing Co., under its prior ownership. Later he was employed by the Manchester newspapers as a bureau manager, reporter and feature writer. He has also worked at newspapers in Boston and New York. A retired Naval Reserve officer, Mr. Cash served on active duty during World War II and the Korean Conflict.

ARE AMERICANS NATURALLY RELIGIOUS?

Maybe they're naturally industrious, inventive or frontier-oriented.

But naturally religious? No.

85 million Americans have no expressed faith. Millions more don't practice the faith they profess. Millions more, every year, drift away from faith altogether.

If you believe in the power of the Gospel of Jesus and think His Gospel still has something to offer America, then maybe you should investigate the Paulist way of life.

The Paulists are a small community of Catholic priests who have been bringing the Gospel of Jesus to the American People in innovative ways for over 100 years.

We do this everyday through the communication arts—books, publications, television and radio—on college campuses, in parishes, in missions in the U.S., in downtown centers, in working with young and old.

We don't believe in sitting back. Do you?

Literature Is Alive In Vermont

by George R. Clay

Literature may be dead or dying elsewhere, but it's live as Lazarus in Vermont.

Last Saturday close to 150 people who had come from all corners of the state – many of them driving three hours through the early-morning downpour – packed into the Stratton Mountain Inn to hear nine writers read and discuss an extraordinarily fine assortment of original poetry and fiction, at a free, public symposium that filled the meeting room by ten in the morning and grew even more crowded before the program ended at five in the afternoon.

Called VERMONT WRITERS: 1975, the affair was sponsored by the Vermont Academy of Arts and Sciences and assisted by a grant from the Vermont Council on the Arts. In other words it was a deep-dyed Green Mountain gathering – the first symposium of resident Vermont writers ever to be held in this state. But by and large neither the cast nor the script was remotely regional in character.

Take William Arrowsmith, who read poetry during the afternoon. He lives in Lincoln, but he also happens to be a founding editor of The Hudson Review who has taught at five colleges and been awarded honorary degrees from nine.

One of the morning readers, Robert Pack of Cornwall, is Director of the Breadloaf Writers' Conference, professor at Middlebury College, has published six volumes of poetry and is about to publish a seventh. To match this, Nicholas Delbanco of the Bennington College faculty has published seven novels and, toward mid-afternoon, read from the final chapter of his eighth.

The rest of the participants were of this same general caliber: T. Alan Broughton and Margaret Edwards of Burlington and the UVM faculty; John Engels of Williston and the St. Michael's College faculty; David Budbill of Wolcott, Richard Grossinger of Plainfield and the Goddard College faculty, David Huddle of Essex Center and the UVM faculty, and Hayden Carruth of Johnson. As a group, they have published over 50 books, won 13 prizes, received the Prix de Rome and several Guggenheim Fellowships, appeared in numerous anthologies and every literary quarterly imaginable, as well as in such national magazines as Harpers, Esquire and The New Yorker.

With such high audience expectations, and only 20 minutes for each writer to stand up and electrify, you'd think the day might turn out to be a bust – like those movies guaranteed to be lousy because of their all-star cast. Who can sit through two and a half hours in the morning, and another couple of hours in the afternoon, listening to other people's voices?

The answer is, everybody. Nobody left. Nobody even considered leaving. The writers stuck to their 20-minute allotments, and what they read was varied, strong, mesmerizing: by turns humorous and startling, full of love and joy as well as sadness and terror, and always dramatically immediate, with the immediacy of the material augmented by the sound of the author's voice.

Listen to David Budbill, a 36-year old, Cleveland-born ex-theology student who looks like a quarterback on someone's 150-pound football team and, aside from writing poetry, has worked as a carpenter's apprentice, short order cook, day laborer on a Christmas tree farm, street gang worker, and attendant at a mental hospital. The only self-confessed regional writer on the program, Budbill jutted his jaw at the audience, said in a rasping voice that every Vermont poet had to deal somehow with Robert Frost, then read this poem – called "Killing the Ghost of Ripton":

It was last fall sometime.
I couldn't stand it any longer.
The old fart had helped me waste
five years. I got in my car, drove down 100, through Granville Gulf,
past the falls and up over Middlebury Gap.
I found the ghostly bastard standing in a meadow pontificating
to no one.

When I saw him, actually saw him, I almost lost my nerve. He was pitiful standing there alone not knowing all that's happened. Christ!
I loved the old guy! But I had to do it.
There is no point in feeding a ghost.
It's like Moms Mabley says, "People is dyin' today
that never died before."

So I shot him three times through the heart.
I shot him once with the modern American language,
but he didn't fall; he understood.
I shot him with a thousand deserted farms.
He grabbed his chest and staggered back.
Then I pumped him full of Vermont slaves
hanging around all winter
waiting for the summer rich to come.

The old guy crumbled where he stood.
I scooped him up and stuffed him down the well
at the Robert Frost Memorial Wayside
just down the road from Breadloaf.

He's down there still.
Don't go looking for him here.

When the readings ended at 3:30 and the audience divided into two concurrent sessions to discuss poetry and fiction, there was a kind of stunned silence for the first few minutes – then a flood of response.

In other words, the program worked. The interchange between writers and audience was indescribable, yet almost tangible, and so rewarding that it should, and could be tried again. For Vermont is rich in first-rate writers who have yet to be heard from on a similar occasion: Bernard Malamud, Wallace Stegner, Louise Gluck, Galway Kinnell, Ward Just, Frederick Buechner...It's a kind of wealth we are too little aware of, and in which we are too seldom allowed to share.

Vietnam After Victory

by Randy Gellerman

On Sunday evening, October 12, the Vermont Prairie Fire Organizing Committee sponsored a discussion-cum-slide show on "Vietnam after Victory" with Ms. Laura Whitehorn, who had recently visited North Vietnam for ten days last summer.

The meeting had both heartening and disheartening aspects to it. It was heartening to see so many people still interested in Vietnam and the aftermath of that war gathered for the discussion. It was disheartening and almost an insult to the intelligence, to hear Vietnam, Vietnamese Communism and Vietnamese socialism being held up as models for Americans to aspire to; it was dull to hear continuous disparagement of American work and social ethic and political credos; it was grating to witness once more the flogging of the dead horse of the Vietnam tragedy and the self-flagellation of the American conscience.

Let me stress that I am sympathetic with much of the spirit of Ms. Whitehorn and Prairie Fire, to the effect that for many of the ills in our society nothing short of revolution will do. But must we look overseas for the inspiration for revolution? Revolutions, like charity, begin at home and with ourselves, and not with groups, but with and within individuals. It is a tragic hypocrisy that we only hear words like "communal spirit," "brotherly love," "sharing" and the like, when at the same time our actions are to the contrary.

Far from pretending to be an authority on Vietnamese politics and things Vietnamese, I am yet of the opinion that a good deal of the success of socialism and communalism in Vietnam and Oriental nations may be attributed to the strength and warmth of family life which is traditional, not revolutionary. Vietnamese political life has always drawn on the concept of the family for its structure and inspiration; even under the French, colonialism was tolerated because the French were seen as the "elder brothers" and responsible for protecting the "younger siblings." Ho Chi Minh and his successors have appealed to traditionality and family values to denounce, in turn, French and then American and Western culture. Regardless of the validity of their denouncement, a consideration of the nature of Vietnamese family life and structure can instructively clarify for us in the West the success of communism and socialism in the new Vietnam.

There is much in the Vietnamese social system that is commendable: respect for the parents, closeness of sibling and cousin ties, loyalty and support of the individual even when he is in the wrong, quiet acceptance of dependency until one is able to fully assume a responsible position with commensurate privileges. Yet, how many of us in this country could or would subscribe to the authoritarian parental controls, ideas of parental self-sacrifice for children, and stylized roles for men and women? (these latter are still very much present, as Ms. Whitehorn's slides themselves illustrated, in spite of her lauding "women's liberation" and the active participation of women in all parts of society). How many of us could build a communal spirit on the strength of our own relationships with our parents and our own brothers and sisters of blood? We in the West are consciously and unconsciously reared to think independent of our families; children of Vietnamese are brought up to accept the facts of their dependence and to lean on one another and expect that others will lean upon them. The Confucian traditions of order and structure in the family and respect for the parents are, I would submit, integral to the evolving nature of Vietnamese and probably other forms of Asian communism; it would be a mistake to conceptualize their political and social models as ideals for a Western, American society—even a revolutionary society. To evaluate one way of life (American) in terms of patterns and life style espoused by another (Vietnamese) is an even more serious methodological error.

To continue to disparage and blame the American military, political machine or our own parents for the tragedy of Vietnam is a useless and boring pastime. Such attitudes as these are rapidly becoming passe, even trite. One can indeed see the need for a restructuring or uplifting of values, ethics, and government policy in some sectors of American life, but must we build upon the wreckage of Vietnam?

It is significant that the elements of nationalism and patriotism, so pre-eminent in the evolution of modern Asian Communist states, is conspicuous in its absence in radical leftist credos. It is also significant that of those who consider themselves as radical left and working for a change in society, there is none among them approaching the stature, maturity, integrity and popular appeal of Ho Chi Minh. Idealist though I may be, I see revolution as pure; among the criteria for effective revolution must be truth and vision.

Neo-leftist radicalism does not seem to possess either of these. Instead, as typified in Ms. Whitehorn's tirade, it draws its energy from hatred, blame and negativism. Much of the presentation Sunday night was mired in obscurantism and misinterpretation or outright manipulation of facts. How sad it is that intelligent people can not only espouse such ideas, but take others in by them as well! In feeding their political pap to captive audiences, are these so-called revolutionaries so different from the governments and the parents and the society they condemn?

In closing, I would add that it is politically naive to continue to harp on the U.S. as scapegoat for the growing pains of Indochinese states. I myself have been personally much affected by events in the past war—but surely this is an issue altogether apart from the need for a restructuring of American society! A revolution which would be founded on the rubble of the Vietnam war, and which would feed on the emotionalism of a betrayed and disillusioned American people, will hardly be up to the task to which it aspires.

Panty Raid: It's Not So Much Fun For The Girls

Editor's Note: At the time of this article, Old Mill was a women's dorm.

The famous, or more appropriately tithd infamous raid on the girls' dorms has been widely publicized. The point of view given has been rather one-sided, however, namely seen through the eyes of one not living in a girls' dorm. In a brief piece entitled, "Reflections on an Autumn Evening", the inhabitants of Old Mill present their point of view.

Reflections on an Autumn Evening

It's dark outside. The usually bright moon is covered by clouds. I wasn't really interested in the outside now. I was studying History for the hour exam. I knew that clouds were covering the moon, though, because my desk is right near the window and I trampled on everything that came in the way. One of the girls even got a broken toe from them, but like I said, I don't guess they care. Anyway, what finally happened was that they finally had to leave when a counter attack launched by outside forces made it too hot for them to stay. Boy, the place was sure a mess when they left. I was glad my mother couldn't see it. She hates a messy house. We all got together then and sort of tallied up our losses. There was quite a lot too, including our dignity, and we didn't exactly appreciate the whole thing. As a matter of fact, we were so mad we planned a surprise attack on them for the next night but we kind of got talked out of it. It's just as well too because we didn't really have too many members in our ranks and we probably would've been slaughtered.

Later, when everyone was pretty much quieted down and I was back at the desk with my history book (it wasn't taken in the raid. The History book, I mean) I got to wondering what caused the whole business. A lot of people blamed it on an article that was printed in one of the newspapers that's floating around here, I don't think so though. They probably just felt that they had to let off steam or something like that and they used that article as an excuse. The whole thing seems pretty silly to me, though, because, the way I figure it if they let off steam by building up something like their culture instead of destroying things, then they might have a half way decent culture around instead of just being invading barbarians.

I Guess They Were Scared

The other girls figured they probably chickened out or something, but I knew different. I get feelings about things like that and I'm usually kind of right, too. I know something about strategy anyway and I figured they'd be back. They were too, and they started pounding on that poor old door like crazy. We didn't do too much except sit behind the windows and await our doom. I wasn't really scared because I couldn't imagine that they'd really bust the door down. I guess the other girls were though, scared I mean. I know, because one of them fainted as soon as the invasion really began. I was right about the door, by the way. They didn't bust it down, they came in through the window. It was really terrible the way they ran around looting treasures and stuff. I was pretty disgusted. I really was. There wasn't very much I could do though so I just kind of sat there hoping they wouldn't get to my hidden treasures because I really wouldn't like to lose them because they cost money, you know.

It Was A Mess

I guess that didn't bother them though. I don't guess anything bothered them very much the way they just look out now and then.

I was reading about the Egyptians and how they were always being invaded by barbarian tribes and all. History doesn't really move me

This is an interview conducted with Raymond V. Levine, Executive Assistant to the Executive Vice President at the University of Vermont.

Mr. Levine commented on the energy problem at the University, and what steps are being taken to remedy it.

CYNIC – Mr. Levine, so that our readers may get a clearer idea of the energy problem we are facing here at the University, could you please give a brief historical sketch of it?

LEVINE – Certainly. It was during the summer and fall of 1973 when we first recognized that obtaining heating fuel and electricity would be a major problem for the upcoming winter. We had then been informed by our supplier of fuel oil that due to nationwide shortages the University could expect to receive no more than 80% of the previous year's level. The electric company which serves the school declared as much; that is, they could not be counted upon to provide power at the same level as the previous year, indeed there was to be a cutback here too.

In November of 1973 the problem became acute and the administration moved quickly to deal with it. A four day week was instituted, with Monday becoming a holiday. Lighting was reduced wherever possible, thermostats were turned down to 68F, and so forth. Thus, in the 1973-74 school year we reduced energy consumption 30% from what it was the previous year. During the school year 1974-75 our reduction in energy consumption was negligible, a reduction somewhere under 5% of the previous year.

CYNIC – What is the energy policy of the University at present?

LEVINE – Our policy is now basically the same as the one we adopted in November of 1973, with a few modifications. The general thrust is the same; there is a feasible reduction of energy consumption. The goal for the 1975-76 school year is to reduce consumption 10% of last year.

CYNIC – How will this be accomplished and what will be the noticeable changes around the school?

LEVINE – Various measures have been adopted to conserve energy resources; the objective of these measures is to reduce both total consumption and "peak period" consumption.

First we will deal with the use of electricity. All ornamental lighting of buildings will be discontinued. In order to provide security for the campus, however, major pedestrian walkways will, of course, continue to be lighted. In those buildings and residence halls where it is practical, hall and vestibule lighting will be reduced by one-half. Finally, lighting in offices will be kept at the absolute minimum level for employee personal safety and office efficiency.

Second we will deal with the use of heating fuel. All thermostats will be set at 65F, and they will be checked daily by Physical Plant personnel. All university buildings not used for evening classes will be reduced in temperature starting at 4:00 p.m. During the mid-semester break, all unoccupied buildings, such as residence halls, will be reduced in temperature to the minimum level. The hot water supply to all public lavatory facilities will be restricted and curtailed. In those areas (except for the swimming pool) where physical activities are conducted, the temperature will be lowered to 55F.

Third we will deal with the use of gasoline. Because of the impending gasoline shortage, all university vehicles will be required not to exceed 20 M.P.H. on campus, and 50 M.P.H. on public highways. The plowing of snow and maintenance of the grounds will be reduced to an operational minimum. Car pooling will be encouraged: the University will make a free column in This Week where faculty, staff, and students can list car pools available and wanted.

CYNIC – Is there anything further you wish to say on the problem?

LEVINE – Yes there is. Our reasons for reducing energy consumption at the University of Vermont are twofold: First, because it will help the nation in general; and second because it will help in various ways, to cut the escalating costs here at school. The escalating cost of energy has a definite influence on the tuition, room and board and fees which students pay for.

We need help – help from students, faculty, and administrators alike. We need suggestions and letters from those in the University community. All correspondence should be directed to this address:

Energy Conservation
c/o Presidents Office
Waterman Building

I promise that I will respond to all worthwhile suggestions.

As the University looks into the future we see that further reductions in energy consumption will be necessary. The Energy Conservation will continue to meet to formulate contingency plans in the event that the situation worsens.

BURLINGTON – Humor, such as beauty, is in the eyes and ears of the beholder. Therefore it presents itself as a difficult task to sit down and review The National Lampoon Show, which greeted UVM this Tuesday evening.

The show was free, so the one half of Patrick Gymnasium used was full with rowdies, mid-streams, and a quantity of Lampoon lovers prepared to see a production in which nothing is sacred.

"O.K. everybody turn to the person next to you and look 'em right in the eyes, come on do it, do it."

Pause

"Now give that person a kiss, that's right, kiss 'em."

Pause

"Kiss 'em again, ALRIGHT. NOW GO DOWN ON 'EM."

Funny? No. Well ya' had to be there. The cast told us that they didn't give a shit and then they proceeded to find a lot of things not to give a shit about.

The unfortunate fact is that this is the sort of humor which does not stick in your mind. This is due in part to the great number of skits presented, but it also reflects the content of the show. Go ahead, if you were there try and remember specific skits, other than the plant killing scene.

The six multi-talented performers, two women and four men, all possessed the skills to sing, mimic, and scoot around the stage to the beat of their superb piano player. They are all recruits from either Broadway or such incubators for LAMPOON talent, as Chicago's famed Second City. From watching the performance there is no doubt that they are professionals.

The biggest mistake that can be made when dealing with LAMPOON'S type of humor is to take it seriously. Admit to yourself that it is sick, perverted, racist, tasteless and has little if anything important to say – as they admit to the audience – and the evening may not be wasted, it could even be a lot of fun. No doubt you will see and hear things the likes of which you have never encountered before.

A blind Rhoda Mary Tyler Moore getting the shit beat out of her, by wonderful Steve, had people in hysterics. It was even funny when she thought it was her dog pissing on her leg. Too bad it wasn't her dog, or piss.

Guilt struck the audience when it appeared that they were about to witness the destruction of a plant.

"I'm gonna kill this plant right in front of your eyes. I don't care about it and I'm gonna kill it."

A few chuckles and then silence.

"First, I'll torture it. Plants love water, don't they."

Out comes a glass of water which is slowly passed around, above, and under the helpless plant.

"Now, I'm gonna kill the fucking thing."

He rips off a limb or two.

"How many of you want me to kill this fucking plant? If you do, say "yes," If not, say "no." All in favor?"

One third of the audience responded, not too enthusiastically.

"All opposed."

A loud yell from the remaining two-thirds. I think he was surprised.

"All right, if you want this goddamned thing to live so bad, I'll take a dollar for it. Come on, pay up."

Another branch falls to the floor.

"So nobody cares."

Off with another branch. Then rushing from the right side of the stage comes a body which hands the actor a bill.

"Shit, a five dollar bill for this plant, Wow."

He looks down at the woman and tells her to leave. She jumps up to the stage grabbing for the life of the now dismembered prop.

"Get her outta' here," he says.

And so his cohorts come to remove this woman who cares enough to do what she believes, the leaves in silence a

Literature Is Alive In Vermont

by George R. Clay

Literature may be dead or dying elsewhere, but it's live as Lazarus in Vermont.

Last Saturday close to 150 people who had come from all corners of the state – many of them driving three hours through the early-morning downpour – packed into the Stratton Mountain Inn to hear nine writers read and discuss an extraordinarily fine assortment of original poetry and fiction, at a free, public symposium that filled the meeting room by ten in the morning and grew even more crowded before the program ended at five in the afternoon.

Called VERMONT WRITERS: 1975, the affair was sponsored by the Vermont Academy of Arts and Sciences and assisted by a grant from the Vermont Council on the Arts. In other words it was a deep-dyed Green Mountain gathering – the first symposium of resident Vermont writers ever to be held in this state. But by and large neither the cast nor the script was remotely regional in character.

Take William Arrowsmith, who read poetry during the afternoon. He lives in Lincoln, but he also happens to be a founding editor of The Hudson Review who has taught at five colleges and been awarded honorary degrees from nine.

One of the morning readers, Robert Pack of Cornwall, is Director of the Breadloaf Writers' Conference, professor at Middlebury College, has published six volumes of poetry and is about to publish a seventh. To match this, Nicholas Delbanco of the Bennington College faculty has published seven novels and, toward mid-afternoon, read from the final chapter of his eighth.

The rest of the participants were of this same general caliber: T. Alan Broughton and Margaret Edwards of Burlington and the UVM faculty, John Engels of Williston and the St. Michael's College faculty; David Budbill of Walcott, Richard Gruninger of Plainfield and the Goddard College faculty, David Huddle of Essex Center and the UVM faculty, and Hayden Carruth of Johnson. As a group, they have published over 50 books, won 13 prizes, received the Prix de Rome and several Guggenheim Fellowships, appeared in numerous anthologies and every literary quarterly imaginable, as well as in such national magazines as Harpers, Esquire and The New Yorker.

With such high audience expectations, and only 20 minutes for each writer to stand up and electrify, you'd think the day might turn out to be a bust – like those movies guaranteed to be lousy because of their all-star cast. Who can sit through two and a half hours in the morning, and another couple of hours in the afternoon, listening to other people's voices?

The answer is, everybody. Nobody left. Nobody even considered leaving. The writers stuck to their 20-minute allotments, and what they read was varied, strong, mesmerizing: by turns humorous and startling, full of love and joy as well as sadness and terror, and always dramatically immediate, with the immediacy of the material augmented by the sound of the author's voice.

Listen to David Budbill, a 36-year old, Cleveland-born ex-theology student who looks like a quarterback on someone's 150-pound football team and, aside from writing poetry, has worked as a carpenter's apprentice, short order cook, day laborer on a Christmas tree farm, street gang worker, and attendant at a mental hospital. The only self-confessed regional writer on the program, Budbill jutted his jaw at the audience, said in a rasping voice that every Vermont poet had to deal somehow with Robert Frost, then read this poem – called "Killing the Ghost of Ripton":

It was last fall sometime.
I couldn't stand it any longer.
The old fart had helped me waste
five years. I got in my car,
drove down 100, through Granville Gulf,
past the falls and up over Middlebury Gap.
I found the ghostly bastard
standing in a meadow pontificating
to no one.

When I saw him, actually saw him, I almost lost
my nerve. He was pitiful standing there alone
not knowing all that's happened. Christ!
I loved the old guy! But I had to do it.
There is no point in feeding a ghost.
It's like Moms Mabley says, "People is dyin' today
that never died before."

So I shot him three times through the heart.
I shot him once with the modern American language,
but he didn't fall; he understood.
I shot him with a thousand deserted farms.
He grabbed his chest and staggered back.
Then I pumped him full of Vermont slaves
hanging around all winter
waiting for the summer rich to come.

The old guy crumbled where he stood.
I scooped him up and stuffed him down the well
at the Robert Frost Memorial Wayside
just down the road from Breadloaf.

He's down there still.
Don't go looking for him here.

When the readings ended at 3:30 and the audience divided into two concurrent sessions to discuss poetry and fiction, there was a kind of stunned silence for the first few minutes – then a flood of response.

In other words, the program worked. The interchange between writers and audience was indescribable, yet almost tangible, and so rewarding that it should, and could be tried again. The whole thing seems pretty silly to me, though, because, the way I figure it if they let off steam by building up something like their culture instead of destroying things, then they might have a half way decent culture around instead of just being invading barbarians.

I Guess They Were Scared

The other girls figured they probably chickened out or something, but I knew different. I get feelings about things like that and I'm usually kind of right, too. I know something about strategy anyway and I figured they'd be back. They were too, and they started pounding on that poor old door like crazy. We didn't do too much except sit behind the windows and await our doom. I wasn't really scared because I couldn't imagine that they'd really bust the door down. I guess the other girls were though, scared I mean. I know, because one of them fainted as soon as the invasion really began. I was right about the door, by the way. They didn't bust it down, they came in through the window. It was really terrible the way they ran around looting treasures and stuff. I was pretty disgusted. I really was. There wasn't very much I could do though so I just kind of sat there hoping they wouldn't get to my hidden treasures because I really wouldn't like to lose them because they cost money, you know.

It Was A Mess

I guess that didn't bother them though. I don't guess anything bothered them very much the way they just look out now and then.

I was reading about the Egyptians and how they were always being invaded by barbarian tribes and all. History doesn't really move me

This is an interview conducted with Raymond V. Levine, Executive Assistant to the Executive Vice President at the University of Vermont.

Mr. Levine commented on the energy problem at the University, and what steps are being taken to remedy it.

CYNIC – Mr. Levine, so that our readers may get a clearer idea of the energy problem we are facing here at the University, could you please give a brief historical sketch of it?

LEVINE – Certainly. It was during the summer and fall of 1973 when we first recognized that obtaining heating fuel and electricity would be a major problem for the upcoming winter. We had then been informed by our supplier of fuel oil that due to nationwide shortages the University could expect to receive no more than 80% of the previous year's level. The electric company which serves the school declared as much; that is, they could not be counted upon to provide power at the same level as the previous year, indeed there was to be a cutback here too.

In November of 1973 the problem became acute and the administration moved quickly to deal with it. A four day week was instituted, with Monday becoming a holiday. Lighting was reduced wherever possible, thermostats were turned down to 68F, and so forth. Thus, in the 1973-74 school year we reduced energy consumption 30% from what it was the previous year. During the school year 1974-75 our reduction in energy consumption was negligible, a reduction somewhere under 5% of the previous year.

CYNIC – What is the energy policy of the University at present?

LEVINE – Our policy is now basically the same as the one we adopted in November of 1973, with a few modifications. The general thrust is the same; there is a feasible reduction of energy consumption. The goal for the 1975-76 school year is to reduce consumption 10% of last year.

CYNIC – How will this be accomplished and what will be the noticeable changes around the school?

LEVINE – Various measures have been adopted to conserve energy resources; the objective of these measures is to reduce both total consumption and "peak period" consumption.

First we will deal with the use of electricity. All ornamental lighting of buildings will be discontinued. In order to provide security for the campus, however, major pedestrian walkways will, of course, continue to be lighted. In those buildings and residence halls where it is practical, hall and vestibule lighting will be reduced by one-half. Finally, lighting in offices will be kept at the absolute minimum level for employee personal safety and office efficiency.

Second we will deal with the use of heating fuel. All thermostats will be set at 65F, and they will be checked daily by Physical Plant personnel. All university buildings not used for evening classes will be reduced in temperature starting at 4:00 p.m. During the mid-semester break, all unoccupied buildings, such as residence halls, will be reduced in temperature to the minimum level. The hot water supply to all public lavatory facilities will be restricted and curtailed. In those areas (except for the swimming pool) where physical activities are conducted, the temperature will be lowered to 55F.

Third we will deal with the use of gasoline. Because of the impending gasoline shortage, all university vehicles will be required not to exceed 20 M.P.H. on campus, and 50 M.P.H. on public highways. The plowing of snow and maintenance of the grounds will be reduced to an operational minimum. Car pooling will be encouraged: the University will make a free column in This Week where faculty, staff, and students can list car pools available and wanted.

CYNIC – Is there anything further you wish to say on the problem?

LEVINE – Yes there is. Our reasons for reducing energy consumption at the University of Vermont are twofold: First, because it will help the nation in general; and second because it will help in various ways, to cut the escalating costs here at school. The escalating cost of energy has a definite influence on the tuition, room and board and fees which students pay for.

We need help – help from students, faculty, and administrators alike. We need suggestions and letters from those in the University community. All correspondence should be directed to this address:

I promise that I will respond to all worthwhile suggestions.

As the University looks into the future we see that further reductions in energy consumption will be necessary. The Energy Conservation will continue to meet to formulate contingency plans in the event that the situation worsens.

We Don't G

by Steve Brown

BURLINGTON – Humor, such as beauty, is in the eyes and ears of the beholder. Therefore it presents itself as a difficult task to sit down and review The National Lampoon Show, which greeted UVM this Tuesday evening.

The show was free, so the one half of Patrick Gymnasium used was full with rowdies, mid-streams, and a quantity of Lampoon lovers prepared to see a production in which nothing is sacred.

"O.K. everybody turn to the person next to you and look 'em right in the eyes, come on do it, do it."

Pause

"Now give that person a kiss, that's right, kiss 'em."

Pause

"Kiss 'em again, ALRIGHT. NOW GO DOWN ON 'EM."

Funny? No. Well ya' had to be there. The cast told us that they didn't give a shit and then they proceeded to find a lot of things not to give a shit about.

The unfortunate fact is that this is the sort of humor which does not stick in your mind. This is due in part to the great number of skits presented, but it also reflects the content of the show. Go ahead, if you were there try and remember specific skits, other than the plant killing scene.

The six multi-talented performers, two women and four men, all possessed the skills to sing, mimic, and scoot around the stage to the beat of their superb piano player. They are all recruits from either Broadway or such incubators for LAMPOON talent, as Chicago's famed Second City. From watching the performance there is no doubt that they are professionals.

The biggest mistake that can be made when dealing with LAMPOON'S type of humor is to take it seriously. Admit to yourself that it is sick, perverted, racist, tasteless and has little if anything important to say – as they admit to the audience – and the evening may not be wasted, it could even be a lot of fun. No doubt you will see and hear things the likes of which you have never encountered before.

A blind Rhoda Mary Tyler Moore getting the shit beat out of her, by wonderful Steve, had people in hysterics. If was even funny when she thought it was her dog pissing on her leg. Too bad it wasn't her dog, or piss.

Guilt struck the audience when it appeared that they were about to witness the destruction of a plant.

"I'm gonna kill this plant right in front of your eyes. I don't care about it and I'm gonna kill it."

A few chuckles and then silence.

"First, I'll torture it. Plants love water, don't they."

Out comes a glass of water which is slowly passed around, above, and under the helpless plant.

"Now, I'm gonna kill the fucking thing."

He rips off a limb or two.

"How many of you want me to kill this fucking plant? If you do, say "yes," If not, say "no." All in favor?"

One third of the audience responded, not too enthusiastically.

"All opposed."

A loud yell from the remaining two-thirds. I think he was surprised.

"All right, if you want this goddamned thing to live so bad, I'll take a dollar for it. Come on, pay up."

Another branch falls to the floor.

"So nobody cares."

Off with another branch. Then rushing from the right side of the stage comes a body which hands the actor a bill.

"Shit, a five dollar bill for this plant, Wow."

He looks down at the woman and tells her to leave. She jumps up to the stage grabbing for the life of the now dismembered prop.

"Get her outta' here," he says.

And so his cohorts come to remove this woman who cares enough to do what she believes, she leaves in silence.

Literature Is Alive In Vermont

by George R. Clay

Literature may be dead or dying elsewhere, but it's live as Lazarus in Vermont.

Last Saturday* close to 150 people who had come from all corners of the state – many of them driving three hours through the early-morning downpour – packed into the Stratton Mountain Inn to hear nine writers read and discuss an extraordinarily fine assortment of original poetry and fiction, at a free, public symposium that filled the meeting room by ten in the morning and grew even more crowded before the program ended at five in the afternoon.

Called VERMONT WRITERS: 1975, the affair was sponsored by the Vermont Academy of Arts and Sciences and assisted by a grant from the Vermont Council on the Arts. In other words it was a deep-dyed Green Mountain gathering – the first symposium of resident Vermont writers ever to be held in this state. But by and large neither the cast nor the script was remotely regional in character.

Take William Arrowsmith, who read poetry during the afternoon. He lives in Lincoln, but he also happens to be a founding editor of The Hudson Review who has taught at five colleges and been awarded honorary degrees from nine.

One of the morning readers, Robert Pack of Cornwall, is Director of the Breadloaf Writers' Conference, professor at Middlebury College, has published six volumes of poetry and is about to publish a seventh. To match this, Nicholas Delbanco of the Bennington College faculty has published seven novels and, toward mid-afternoon, read from the final chapter of his eighth.

The rest of the participants were of this same general caliber: T. Alan Broughton and Margaret Edwards of Burlington and the UVM faculty; John Engels of Williston and the St. Michael's College faculty; David Budbill of Walcott, Richard Grossinger of Plainfield and the Goddard College faculty; David Huddle of Essex Center and the UVM faculty; and Hayden Carruth of Johnson. As a group, they have published over 50 books, won 13 prizes, received the Prix de Rome and several Guggenheim Fellowships, appeared in numerous anthologies and every literary quarterly imaginable, as well as in such national magazines as Harpers, Esquire and The New Yorker.

With such high audience expectations, and only 20 minutes for each writer to stand up and electrify, you'd think the day might turn out to be a bust – like those movies guaranteed to be lousy because of their all-star cast. Who can sit through two and a half hours in the morning, and another couple of hours in the afternoon, listening to other people's voices?

The answer is, everybody. Nobody left. Nobody even considered leaving. The writers stuck to their 20-minute allotments, and what they read was varied, strong, mesmerizing: by turns humorous and startling, full of love and joy as well as sadness and terror, and always dramatically immediate, with the immediacy of the material augmented by the sound of the author's voice.

Listen to David Budbill, a 36-year old, Cleveland-born ex-theology student who looks like a quarterback on someone's 150-pound football team and, aside from writing poetry, has worked as a carpenter's apprentice, short order cook, day laborer on a Christmas tree farm, street gang worker, and attendant at a mental hospital. The only self-confessed regional writer on the program, Budbill jutted his jaw at the audience, said in a rasping voice that every Vermont poet had to deal somehow with Robert Frost, then read this poem – called "Killing the Ghost of Ripton":

It was last fall sometime.
I couldn't stand it any longer.
The old fart had helped me waste
five years. I got in my car,
drove down 100, through Granville Gulf,
past the falls and up over Middlebury Gap.
I found the ghostly bastard
standing in a meadow pontificating
to no one.

When I saw him, actually saw him, I almost lost
my nerve. He was pitiful standing there alone
not knowing all that's happened. Christ!
I loved the old guy! But I had to do it.
There is no point in feeding a ghost.
It's like Moms Mabley says, "People is dyin' today
that never died before."

So I shot him three times through the heart.
I shot him once with the modern American language,
but he didn't fall; he understood.
I shot him with a thousand deserted farms.
He grabbed his chest and staggered back.
Then I pumped him full of Vermont slaves
hanging around all winter
waiting for the summer rich to come.

The old guy crumbled where he stood.
I scooped him up and stuffed him down the well
at the Robert Frost Memorial Wayside
just down the road from Breadloaf.

He's down there still.
Don't go looking for him here.

When the readings ended at 3:30 and the audience divided into two concurrent sessions to discuss poetry and fiction, there was a kind of stunned silence for the first few minutes – then a flood of response.

In other words, the program worked. The interchange between writers and audience was indescribable, yet almost tangible, and so rewarding that it should, and could be tried again. For Vermont is rich in first-rate writers who have yet to be heard from on a similar occasion: Bernard Malamud, Wallace Stegner, Louise Gluck, Galway Kinnell, Ward Just, Frederick Buechner...It's a kind of wealth we are too little aware of, and in which we are too seldom allowed to share.

*Called VERMONT WRITERS: 1975 because the symposium was sponsored by the Vermont Academy of Arts and Sciences and assisted by a grant from the Vermont Council on the Arts.

Vietnam After Victory

by Randy Gellerman

On Sunday evening, October 12, the Vermont Prairie Fire Organizing Committee sponsored a discussion-cum-slide show on "Vietnam after Victory" with Ms. Laura Whitehorn, who had recently visited North Vietnam for ten days last summer.

The meeting had both heartening and disheartening aspects to it. It was heartening to see so many people still interested in Vietnam and the aftermath of that war gathered for the discussion. It was disheartening and almost an insult to the intelligence, to hear Vietnam, Vietnamese Communism and Vietnamese socialism being held up as models for Americans to aspire to; it was dull to hear continuous disparagement of American work and social ethic and political credos; it was grating to witness once more the flogging of the dead horse of the Vietnam tragedy and the self-flagellation of the American conscience.

Let me stress that I am sympathetic with much of the spirit of Ms. Whitehorn and Prairie Fire, to the effect that for many of the ills in our society nothing short of revolution will do. But must we look overseas for the inspiration for revolution? Revolutions, like charity, begin at home and with ourselves, and not with groups, but with and within individuals. It is a tragic hypocrisy that we only hear words like "communal spirit," "brotherly love," "sharing" and the like, when at the same time our actions are to the contrary.

Far from pretending to be an authority on Vietnamese politics and things Vietnamese, I am yet of the opinion that a good deal of the success of socialism and communalism in Vietnam and Oriental nations may be attributed to the strength and warmth of family life which is traditional, not revolutionary. Vietnamese political life has always drawn on the concept of the family for its structure and inspiration; even under the French, colonialism was tolerated because the French were seen as the "elder brothers" and responsible for protecting the "younger siblings." Ho Chi Minh and his successors have appealed to traditionality and family values to denounce, in turn, French and then American and Western culture. Regardless of the validity of their denouncement, a consideration of the nature of Vietnamese family life and structure can instructively clarify for us in the West the success of communism and socialism in the new Vietnam.

There is much in the Vietnamese social system that is commendable: respect for the parents, closeness of sibling and cousin ties, loyalty and support of the individual even when he is in the wrong, quiet acceptance of dependency until one is able to fully assume a responsible position with commensurate privileges. Yet, how many of us in this country could or would subscribe to the authoritarian parental controls, ideas of parental self-sacrifice for children, and stylized roles for men and women? (these latter are still very much present, as Ms. Whitehorn's slides themselves illustrated, in spite of her lauding "women's liberation" and the active participation of women in all parts of society). How many of us could build a communal spirit on the strength of our own relationships with our parents and our own brothers and sisters of blood? We in the West are consciously and unconsciously reared to think independent of our families; children of Vietnamese are brought up to accept the facts of their dependence and to lean on one another and expect that others will lean upon them. The Confucian traditions of order and structure in the family and respect for the parents are, I would submit, integral to the evolving nature of Vietnamese and probably other forms of Asian communism; it would be a mistake to conceptualize their political and social models as ideals for a Western, American society—even a revolutionary society. To evaluate one way of life (American) in terms of patterns and life style espoused by another (Vietnamese) is an even more serious methodological error.

To continue to disparage and blame the American military, political machine or our own parents for the tragedy of Vietnam is a useless and boring pastime. Such attitudes as these are rapidly becoming passe, even trite. One can indeed see the need for a restructuring or uplifting of values, ethics, and government policy in some sectors of American life, but must we build upon the wreckage of Vietnam?

It is significant that the elements of nationalism and patriotism, so pre-eminent in the evolution of modern Asian Communist states, is conspicuous in its absence in radical leftist credos. It is also significant that of those who consider themselves as radical left and working for a change in society, there is none among them approaching the stature, maturity, integrity and popular appeal of Ho Chi Minh. Idealist though I may be, I see revolution as pure; among the criteria for effective revolution must be truth and vision.

Neo-leftist radicalism does not seem to possess either of these. Instead, as typified in Ms. Whitehorn's tirade, it draws its energy from hatred, blame and negativism. Much of the presentation Sunday night was mired in obscurantism and misinterpretation or outright manipulation of facts. How sad it is that intelligent people can not only espouse such ideas, but take others in by them as well! In feeding their political pap to captive audiences, are these so-called revolutionaries so different from the governments and the parents and the society they condemn?

In closing, I would add that it is politically naive to continue to harp on the U.S. as scapegoat for the growing pains of Indochinese states. I myself have been personally much affected by events in the past war—but surely this is an issue altogether apart from the need for a restructuring of American society! A revolution which would be founded on the rubble of the Vietnam war, and which would feed on the emotionalism of a betrayed and disillusioned American people, will hardly be up to the task to which it aspires.

Panty Raid: It's Not So Much Fun For The Girls

by Doris Maier

Reprinted from The Vermont Cynic, October 25, 1950.

Editor's Note: At the time of this article, Old Mill was a women's dorm.

The famous, or more appropriately titled infamous raid on the girls' dorms has been widely publicized. The point of view given has been rather one-sided, however, namely seen through the eyes of one not living in a girls' dorm. In a brief piece entitled, "Reflections on an Autumn Evening", the inhabitants of Old Mill present their point of view.

Reflections on an Autumn Evening

It's dark outside. The usually bright moon is covered by clouds. I wasn't really interested in the outside now. I was studying History for the hour exam. I knew that clouds were covering the moon, though, because my desk is right near the window and I trampled on everything that came in the way. One of the girls even got a broken toe from them, but like I said, I don't guess they care. Anyway, what finally happened was that they finally had to leave when a counter attack launched by outside forces made it too hot for them to stay. Boy, the place was sure a mess when they left. I was glad my mother couldn't see it. She hates a messy house. We all got together then and sort of tallied up our losses. There was quite a lot too, including our dignity, and we didn't exactly appreciate the whole thing. As a matter of fact, we were so mad we planned a surprise attack on them for the next night but we kind of got talked out of it. It's just as well too because we didn't really have too many members in our ranks and we probably would've been slaughtered.

Later, when everyone was pretty much quieted down and I was back at the desk with my history book (it wasn't taken in the raid. The History book, I mean) I got to wondering what caused the whole business. A lot of people blamed it on an article that was printed in one of the newspapers that's floating around here, I don't think so though. They probably just felt that they had to let off steam or something like that and they used that article as an excuse. The whole thing seems pretty silly to me, though, because, the way I figure it if they let off steam by building up something like their culture instead of destroying things, then they might have a half way decent culture around instead of just being invading barbarians.

I Guess They Were Scared

The other girls figured they probably chickened out or something, but I knew different. I get feelings about things like that and I'm usually kind of right, too. I know something about strategy anyway and I figured they'd be back. They were too, and they started pounding on that poor old door like crazy. We didn't do too much except sit behind the windows and await our doom. I wasn't really scared because I couldn't imagine that they'd really bust the door down. I guess the other girls were though, scared I mean. I know, because one of them fainted as soon as the invasion really began. I was right about the door, by the way. They didn't bust it down, they came in through the window. It was really terrible the way they ran around looting treasures and stuff. I was pretty disgusted. I really was. There wasn't very much I could do though so I just kind of sat there hoping they wouldn't get to my hidden treasures because I really wouldn't like to lose them because they cost money, you know.

We Don't G

BURLINGTON – Humor, such as beauty, is in the eyes and ears of the beholder. Therefore it presents itself as a difficult task to sit down and review The National Lampoon Show, which greeted UVM this Tuesday evening.

The show was free, so the one half of Patrick Gymnasium used was full with rowdies, mid-streams, and a quantity of Lampoon lovers prepared to see a production in which nothing is sacred.

"O.K. everybody turn to the person next to you and look 'em right in the eyes, come on do it, do it."

Pause

"Now give that person a kiss, that's right, kiss 'em."

Pause

"Kiss 'em again, ALRIGHT. NOW GO DOWN ON 'EM."

Funny? No. Well ya' had to be there. The cast told us that they didn't give a shit and then they proceeded to find a lot of things not to give a shit about.

The unfortunate fact is that this is the sort of humor which does not stick in your mind. This is due in part to the great number of skits presented, but it also reflects the content of the show. Go ahead, if you were there try and remember specific skits, other than the plant killing scene.

The six multi-talented performers, two women and four men, all possessed the skills to sing, mimic, and scoot around the stage to the beat of their superb piano player. They are all recruits from either Broadway or such incubators for LAMPOON talent, as Chicago's famed Second City. From watching the performance there is no doubt that they are professionals.

The biggest mistake that can be made when dealing with LAMPOON'S type of humor is to take it seriously. Admit to yourself that it is sick, perverted, racist, tasteless and has little if anything important to say – as they admit to the audience – and the evening may not be wasted, it could even be a lot of fun. No doubt you will see and hear things the likes of which you have never encountered before.

A blind Rhoda Mary Tyler Moore getting the shit beat out of her, by wonderful Steve, had people in hysterics. It was even funny when she thought it was her dog pissing on her leg. Too bad it wasn't her dog, or piss.

Guilt struck the audience when it appeared that they were about to witness the destruction of a plant.

"I'm gonna kill this plant right in front of your eyes. I don't care about it and I'm gonna kill it."

A few chuckles and then silence.

"First, I'll torture it. Plants love water, don't they."

Out comes a glass of water which is slowly passed around, above, and under the helpless plant.

"Now, I'm gonna kill the fucking thing."

He rips off a limb or two.

"How many of you want me to kill this fucking plant? If you do, say "yes." If not, say "no." All in favor?"

One third of the audience responded, not too enthusiastically.

"All opposed."

A loud yell from the remaining two-thirds. I think he was surprised.

"All right, if you want this goddamned thing to live so bad, I'll take a dollar for it. Come on, pay up."

Another branch falls to the floor.

"So nobody cares."

Off with another branch. Then rushing from the right side of the stage comes a body which hands the actor a bill.

"Shit, a five dollar bill for this plant, Wow."

He looks down at the woman and tells her to leave. She jumps up to the stage grabbing for the life of the now dismembered prop.

"Get her outta' here," he says.

And so his cohorts come to remove this woman who cared enough to do what she believes, she leaves in silence e

"Get her outta' here," he says.

And so his cohorts come to remove this woman who cares enough to do what she believes, she leaves in silence as the actor takes her plant and the money back to the center stage. To add insult to injury, he holds up the five dollar bill and sets it on fire. The audience goes into hysterics.

The fact is that this woman was not a part of the act. She was for real and as the act closed, she got her plant but not her five dollar bill.

The press release called a scene in which we see imprisoned Watergaters screaming about the pains of playing golf and drinking domestic champaign, a show stopper. I found it slow, dated and basically boring. This was also my reaction to a mock interview with Gerry Ford in which you couldn't understand a single word.

And so the evening occurred, and taken for exactly what it was, I was superbly entertained. Whether I was humored is another question.

Journalism Class Meets Mayor Paquette

by Wendy Pierce

I rushed late, as usual, for my Journalism class. That's because I start pecking away at the typewriter at 6:30 to finish my weekly best (story) for a 7:00 class. I never make it on time. Tonight I wasn't psyched to sit for three hours, and listen to Bruce Talbot, our professor, lecture. How would I survive without any coffee?

Bruce surprised all of us, with a Press Conference with the mayor of Burlington. What a coincidence, today I just found out that the mayor of Burlington was Gordon H. Paquette, and tonight I was going to meet the man.

At 8:00 p.m., a middle-aged man with greying hair and dressed leisurely walked into room 101, Possessy Hall. He didn't look like anybody really important and didn't talk in any official sounding jargon. Paquette was a simple person and used simple words that anyone could understand.

Mayor Paquette's philosophy is "that people should know what's going on."

The Mayor is faced with a problem of the revenue sharing plan, in a town that might run out after June 30. "It looks like trouble on the federal level." The Federal Revenue Sharing Program brings about $1 million a year into Burlington. The money goes towards human services, city employee salaries, and capital improvements. If the program doesn't continue for 1976-77, there will have to be cuts in staff or salaries.

The mayor's master plan for the city of Burlington is for urban renewal. Paquette is in the process of completing the construction of the downtown Civic Center, and to develop the lakefront area for public use. "When I was a young boy we could go skating during the winter, and in the summertime, it was a playground area." Through urban renewal, he would like to bring back a place for winter and summer activities in Burlington.

With mall shops opening, a parking garage to be completed by Christmas and a new hotel with 200 rooms, Burlington is growing. Paquette would like to save the Fletcher Free Library, as was the Post Office, which is now the Court House on Main St. Rejuvenating the original old buildings can be done at reasonable costs, and keep the character they give the city.

"Burlington is a progressive city with its share of a moderate drug problem and crime rate, but not on a serious level." Even though Burlington is moving right along with the times, Vermont is still not an industrialized state. Mayor Paquette looks for smaller businesses for the Burlington area.

Mayor Paquette said, "that being Mayor was a people business, and not a political ball game." Paquette is a people mayor, he speaks for what the people in Burlington think and want.

A dedicated politician, the mayor still finds leisure time to fish, and spend with his wife Mary, and family of five. The mayor likes to be thought of as a middle of the roader, or independent along with his political affiliation as a democrat.

Presently, Mayor Paquette is a member of the Advisory Board to the Board of Directors, of the National League of Cities (NLC), and a member of the Board of Aldermen, the town's council.

On his third term, the mayor is undecided about running again. He gave up his plans to run for Congress this year. "That's where all the action is, and the bills are made up, but I listened to my family who didn't want me to go. I felt loyal to my family at home, and to my even bigger family of Burlington."

Mayor Paquette will be on campus this Thursday night at 7:00 p.m. in the L/L Fireplace room. Paquette will speak on the architectual barriers for the handicapped.

very much but they say that if you really try and stimulate your interest in the subjects you don't like that they kind of grow on you after awhile, so I was sitting there trying to stimulate interest. I must have been doing pretty well too, because after awhile I could sort of hear the battle cries of the barbarians in the distance.

As a matter of fact they weren't too much in the distance either. They were kind of close, like right outside the window. I looked out and sure enough, there was a whole mob of them down there sort of getting ready to storm the blockade. First I thought maybe I should yell a Paul Revere, you know spread the alarm and all that, but by now all the girls were yelling and rushing around like crazy so I figured the alarm was spread enough already. I didn't really mind too much, about the alarm being spread without my help. I mean, because this way I could concentrate on getting a good window seat and watch the attack. First they only hollered a little, but then they came right up to the door and started banging on it like a bunch of maniacs. I thought the house was going to fall in, I really did. All of a sudden they all ran away the whole bunch of them took off, just like that.

Audubon Country Auction

More than 1000 items from Vermont attics and barns will be sold at the Green Mountain Audubon Society "Country Auction II." Donated items were so numerous that it was impossible to sell everything at the first auction so a second is scheduled for Sunday, November 2 from 1:00 to 5:00 p.m. at the Nature Center in Huntington. During the afternoon there will be a special time set aside for children to bid on auction merchandise. All proceeds will be used to pay taxes on the property and provide operating funds for the continuation of educational programs at the Center.

Auction chairwoman Eloise Merchant of Essex Junction reports that there are many unusual and fine items to be sold. Those include a new ½ h.p. capacity motor with a 5/8 inch shaft, sports equipment, ski rack for a VW, clothes dryer, school desks, cherry record player, electric smoke house, foot warmer, camera, old books, vacuum cleaner, lawn mower, electric broiler, car seat, pictures and wall plaques.

Services to be sold include a geology walk with Ethel Schuele, salmon and trout flies tied by John Bagels, a scholarship to the Nature Center Ecology Day Camp, a scotch pine Christmas tree, and a design consultation by Jane Titus.

Colonel Walter Flatow of Waterbury Center, president of the Vermont Auctioneers Association, has offered his services to head the auction. According to Mrs. Merchant, help is still needed on auction day. Call 878-2573 for information.

initiation of a Tenant's Handbook for off-campus students. The current financial situation and proposed additions on the gym and library will be closely monitored as well.

The committee will keep itself up-to-date and informed on all major student concerns. This will be accomplished by inviting experts from the University and Burlington communities to specific meetings dealing with their specialized area. Meetings of this nature will be announced when made open to the student body.

Concerned students are urged to share their ideas and suggestions with the Student Action Committee. The members include: Frank Cioffi, Butch Crandall, Joy Dilorenzo, Karen Jansen, Larry Landry, Rob Millman, Linda Purdy, Laurie Rapp, Mark Saba, Rick Warner, and Chairman Paul Ajamian.

This committee has a great potential to affect major changes on this campus, but it will need continual input and support from many students.

worked my way around to the "Help Wanted."

It was the same old story. The salesman ads were all dolled up to sound like something else. Creative opportunity. Chance for improvement. There were the parttime telephone surveys, and then the real jobs for men with qualifications. Backhoe mechanic. Dairy Farmer. Superintendent of Schools. What were my qualifications? Well it didn't much matter. What I really wanted to do was broadcast the World Series. It was coming up in just a few weeks. I wanted to call NBC and tell them I was the greatest baseball mind of the century, and a natural charmer to boot. I would adore play-baseball lingo, I would make the game fascinating to millions, and my dark good looks would captivate the females of America. Every man, woman and child would see the Series through my eyes! But I don't think their plans included me. There were a few possibilities, pump man at the all night Mobil station, counterman at a pizza joint, and curator of the Salvation Army. That was a good one. What would I curate? Is curate even a word?

I won't go through the whole story, you've probably gotten a job yourself and don't want to be reminded. The all-night Mobil station wouldn't take me unless I got myself bonded. I couldn't see it, it sounded too much like having a hot prod stuck on my belly. The Salvation Army job only hired crippled veterans. And the pizza job, well...

I walked into "Hollow Man Pizza", walked straight into the manager's office in the backroom and said, "Hello. I'm Gregory Katz, your new Pizza man."

The manager looked up at me. God! What a face he had. It was pitted and scared like some kind of horrow film reject. He had this grizzled beard and yellow teeth which were barely visible behind it. His eyes were mottled and dark. "What?" he said.

"I'm here to make pizza. I heard you need a counterman. I'm him."

"You ever made pizza before?"

"Yup, I put in 5 years at "Chapel St. Pizza" in New Haven, Ct. That's the best damn pizza city in this country. And fast too. They keep coming back for more. I keep making it."

"You got references from them?"

"Nope, nothing written. But you can call my boss. I'll even pay for the call."

"What's his number?"

I had to think pretty fast. The hangover was a thing of the past. "203-435-4347," I said. It was the number of my only friend in New Haven. Steve Pitkowitz, a 243 pound wrestler who lived with a rheesus monkey on Whaley Ave.

"O.K. I'll call him tonight. Come back tomorrow and I'll let you know." I stuck out my hands to shake his, but his f was looking back down at his desk. I went out in the street. I had no choice. I had to go to Mike's to bum the money for the phone call. Mike let me use his phone when I promised to pay him when the bill came.

I dialed Steve's number. He was home! I could hear the monkey screech in the background. "Steve, hi, listen, I'm in trouble, need a little help. Do me this one riff: when your phone rings today and tonight answer it "Chapel Street Pizza." Do it for real. If it's some dude from Vermont asking about me, tell him what a great worker I am. Tell how sanitary I am, how I'm diligent, trustworthy, always on time, never sick, never drunk, never on the take. If you do that I'll get a job tomorrow. If not, I'm sunk."

Steve belched. I remembered how he dined on chocolate cake and beer. "Sure Greg, I can dig it. Maybe I'll even get a few take out orders. Who knows?"

"Great Steve, great, I'll send you 1% of my third paycheck, if I last that long." Steve grunted and hung up.

Of course things could get messed up. The boss, Mike, might doublecheck the number with directory assistance. Steve might get drunk and let his monkey answer the phone. Or something crazy like that. But I figured the odds looked cool.

In the morning I was back at "Hollow Man Pizza." I walked in and back to the office. The manager got up when I walked in, and stuck out his paw. "Kid," he said "You got yourself a job."

Harriers Edge Maine

The University of Vermont Cross-Country team put together a strong team performance Saturday to edge by Maine 27-28 at A.T. Post Field. Junior Dave Mulligan came through with his best performance of the year to lead the Catamounts to their narrow one point victory, with a winning time of 22:26. Mulligan overtook Maine's Gerald Laflamme, who finished second, at the four mile mark and out kicked Gerald over the last half mile to win going away by a 10 second margin.

Vermont, who was missing one of its top runners with a pulled muscle, had to get strong performances from everybody, and everybody responded well under the pressure. At the half way point in the race, Maine held the top three positions and seven of the top 10. Things were looking pretty bad at that point, but the Cats refused to die. Everybody knew what they had to do and went out and did it. Peter Weith and Howdy Russell ran strongly over the last two miles, breaking up the Maine Contingent, finishing fourth and fifth respectively. Maine took the next two positions, but Dave Elliot and Bob Steohr who have been running strong all year, finished eighth and ninth to wrap up the victory. It was a total team effort as one place the other way would have spelled defeat for the Cats. The victory was the ninth in a row and brings their season's record to 11-4. The next meet is the Yankee Conference Championship on November 1 at Amherst Mass.

Winner Dave Milligan.

'B' Soccer Wins

The UVM "B" Soccer team upped its record to 6-0-1 last week by soundly defeating Castleton 7-0. It was the sixth shutout for the baby Cats in as many wins. Once again UVM had trouble getting untracked in the first half as the Cats could only manage one first half goal. This came with only 5 minutes gone in the first half. After a brief halftime the baby booters came out fired up and scored their second goal with only a few minutes gone. From there on in, it was all UVM. Craig Hawkins, seeing limited action this season, came off the bench to pace the Cats with four goals, the best performance by a UVM soccer player this year. Jack Greenhall and John Ham also registered goals for UVM. Castleton had quite a few scoring chances but were turned away by excellent defensive play by Steve Potter. Mark (Pete) Dowhan was exceptional on defense making some sparkling head ball plays. Rich Zita, battling back after a prolonged illness, carried the line play for the Cats, although he did have trouble staying out of the way of spectators on the field. All in all, it was a bright day for the baby Cats. They will be looking forward to their final game of the season on Wednesday against Middlebury.

Women's Tennis Wins Last Match

In their final varsity tennis match of the 1975 season, Vermont's Women's Tennis Team overpowered Colby-Sawyer College, 8-0. The Vermont victory secured a winning season's record for the women's team with 4 wins and 3 losses. Despite the decisive victory for the Catamounts, the players had to keep the pressure on their strong New Hampshire opponents throughout the match. The eleven UVM tennis starters really wanted this win, and proved they could capture the victory last Tuesday to close out their season.

Three senior starters for the Women's Tennis Squad played in their final collegiate match for UVM last week. Nancy Mullen, a four-year veteran of the team, has played a strong second singles position most of the season. Mullen will represent Vermont next weekend at the Northeast Collegiate Tennis Tournament. Another four year veteran, Shelby Hanafee, played fourth-singles in the past two varsity matches. Hanafee met with some trouble from strong freshman contenders at the start of the season, but moved her way back up the varsity ladder to finish up the season as a strong competitor for UVM. Senior Brownie Richards has played on the Women's Tennis Team for two years as a strong doubles competitor. She has been a starter most of the season, and along with junior doubles partner Mary Dee, Richards will be competing in the Collegiate Tennis Tourney next weekend at UMass. Next season's tennis team will have to fill in the gaps left by retiring seniors Mullen, Hanafee, and Richards. Their tennis strengths as well as team leadership will be missed.

The Northeast Collegiate Tennis Tournament begins this Friday October 31st in Amherst, Massachusetts. The UVM competitors have been practicing hard all week, as early as 7 a.m. on three weekday mornings, to prepare themselves for the hard competition they will be meeting in the collegiate tournament.

Best of luck to UVM netters, Blood, Mullen, Jenny, Palmer, Richards and Dee!

Results of the Colby-Sawyer Match:

Marshmellows?

When the thermometer falls below thirty-two degrees, it's time for skiing. All those hoping to rush on early season are invited to attend the fourth annual UVM Ski Club Ski Show.

At the show will be people to meet and movies to see. Many area shops will be there to discuss the newest in Alpine and Nordic equipment, and clinics will be held so you can learn more about the care of equipment. Meet and talk to people from the ski areas and learn what they have planned for the season.

Featured event of the day will be the "Swap Shop," a perfect opportunity to buy that equipment you need for a perfect season or to sell the equipment you don't need. Anyone wishing to sell equipment should bring it to the Living/Learning Center Commons between 9:00 a.m. and noon on the day of the show.

It's all happening November eighth from 1:00 to 8:00 p.m. in the Living/Learning Center Commons at UVM. It's free and everyone is invited, so come on down!

With or without marshmellow? Your hot chocolate, of course!

Rugers battle for loose ball.

UVM Rugby Team Shutsout Siena, 13-0

The University of Vermont came back from a week layoff because of Mid-Term Exams to defeat Sienna College, 13 to 0. The margin of victory was less than expected as Sienna was fielding a much smaller and inexperienced team. However, a good solid defensive effort by Sienna, and UVM's inability to develop a coordinated attack for the first half kept the game close until the final minutes of play. UVM got the scoreboard fifteen minutes into the game when Jeff Thomas kicked a thirty yard penalty kick for three points. UVM was then able to move the ball consistently into Sienna's end of the field but was not able to generate any offense from its backfield until the last five minutes of play.

UVM's backfield play then began to improve and the ball was worked out to Bob Roman who scored a 4 point try on a 10 yard run. The conversion was missed, leaving the score at half time at 7 to 0.

The second half saw the UVM backfield take charge of the game. Led by backs Jim Cotrell and Paul Hodlin, UVM was able to make numerous attacks on the Sienna goal line but was repeatedly stopped by Sienna's defense. UVM was eventually able to wear the Sienna team down, when Daryll Alvarez took a ball from a UVM lineout and ran ten yards through the Sienna forwards for a 4 point try. Thomas converted on the point after attempt, making the final score 13 to 0.

UVM Booters

Dick Whidde

by Norm Robinson

In what was described as a "must" game, the University of Vermont Soccer Team fought off a stubborn and excellent Middlebury College team to post its tenth straight win. The Catamounts, on the verge of the Yankee Conference Championship, saw goaltender Jim Taft chalk up his fourth straight shutout, a school record.

The game was extremely physical, as expected between two state rivals. Much of the play was in the middle of the field. Throughout the first half, Vermont controlled the ball well. The first shots promised a good start for the Cats – UVM had nine to the Panther's two.

The Cats seemed to have had communication troubles at the onset, as they bunched together often and had several players going for the ball at the same time. It didn't take too long for them to iron this problem out, however, because they came on to fire several scoring opportunities at Panther goaltender Dave Kynoski.

The scoreboard read 0-0 at the half. But both Taft and Kynoski were able to turn back scoring chances.

As the second half got underway, it looked like one mistake or break would decide the outcome. In what was described as a "must" game, the University of Vermont Soccer Team fought off a stubborn and excellent Middlebury College team to post its tenth straight win. The Catamounts, on the verge of the Yankee Conference Championship, saw goaltender Jim Taft chalk up his fourth straight shutout, a school record.

The game was extremely physical, as expected between two state rivals. Much of the play was in the middle of the field. Throughout the first half, Vermont controlled the ball well. The first shots promised a good start for the Cats – UVM had nine to the Panther's two.

The Cats seemed to have had communication troubles at the onset, as they bunched together often and had several players going for the ball at the same time. It didn't take too long for them to iron this problem out, however, because they came on to fire several scoring opportunities at Panther goaltender Dave Kynoski.

The scoreboard read 0-0 at the half. But both Taft and Kynoski were able to turn back scoring chances.

As the second half got underway, it looked like one mistake or break would decide the outcome. Vermont got that break at The 2:18 mark when "Johnny-on-the-spot" Tim Beal picked up a cross from Gerry Daly that got by Panther Kevin Huntley and slammed it into the right side of the net.

Jim Taft continued to impress all who have seen him. Co-Captain Jim Spink was robbed on a diving stop by Taft and moments later, Payson Swaffield hit a drive that Taft blocked and covered the rebound as it rolled away.

Swaffield had several other chances. One went just wide and the other just cleared the crossbar.

Carl Christensen played another great game, along with an outstanding performance by Brian Hunt. However, the player of the game has to be Dick Whidden. With about 17 minutes left, Whidden's shot just missed the left post. Seconds later, he got it clear again and his blast grazed the crossbar and deflected high.

At the 14:27 mark, he flashed by a defender and his shot found the right post and bounded away. If Dick had pulled his hair out after those tries, no one would have wondered why.

For the Panthers, Steve Sass, Bob Harris and Don Parson were outstanding. Kynoski was superior in the nets and one had to feel that the Cats had indeed been up against a very good team.

In the end, Vermont's superior conditioning, and the fact that the home team can play 23 players to the visitors 16, ran down the Panthers.

The victory was vital to the Catamounts for they hope to move up in the New England Soccer Coaches Poll and get a post-season playoff bid.

Women's Athletic Roundup

by Kimberly Honze

A glance at this past week of UVM's women's athletics shows all the teams active, with field hockey keeping the busiest. In their three games this week they went 1-1-1, their win being a big upset over an undefeated Middlebury team.

In Saturday's big upset, an impressive UVM team soundly defeated an undefeated Middlebury squad. UVM dominated the entire first half and most of the second, when Middlebury finally took over but were unable to score. At the end of the first half, UVM had scored twice on goals by Ellie Cook and Jean Fagins assisted by Lisa Fernandez. Middlebury's goal came on a drive by Ellen Fischer. In the second half, goalie Pam Titus kept Middlebury scoreless, while Sharon Farquharson of UVM scored the third and final goal of the game, making it 3-1 in favor of Vermont.

Wednesday, October 23, saw the UVM Catamount team dropping a close game to Lyndon State College, 3-2. UVM led 2-1 at the end of the first half, with scores by Mary Eddy and Sharon Farquharson. Nancy Gagnon scored Lyndon's lone goal for that half on a hard undercut shot. In the second half, Lyndon scored twice, making the final score 3-2. The first score of the half being a hard hit ball deflected off one of UVM's defensemen, and Lyndon's Maggie Doherty made the third and final goal. UVM's goalie, Pam Titus, made 10 saves, and the combined efforts of Phyllis Coldy and Diane Adler made 15 saves for Lyndon.

On Tuesday, October 21, both the A and B teams met with strong competition from Colby-Sawyer College of New Hampshire. In the A game, UVM settled for a tie of 1-1. Colby-Sawyer team member, Laurie Rast, scored their only goal in the first half with 21 minutes of play gone. UVM goalie, Linda Schiffler, held the strong Colby-Sawyer offense scoreless for the remainder of the game with 8 saves, including one save on a penalty shot. Both teams were clearly evenly matched, each maintaining possession for equal portions of the game. In the second half, UVM upped its offensive power, but was allowed only one goal by Colby-Sawyer goalie, Laurie Schmitzer. Six minutes into the second half, Mary Eddy scored on an assist by Pam Packard, leaving the score at 1-1.

The B team was more successful against Colby-Sawyer, defeating them 6-0. At the end of the first half the score was 3-0, the first goal coming on a penalty shot from half back, Belinda Emerson. That was quickly followed by goals from Jenny Parl and another from Sue Dana. Three more goals were scored in the second half by Christie Ford, D.G. Blair, and Nicki Hammond. The defense played an excellent game allowing Colby-Sawyer no shots on goal.

The tennis team was equally successful against their Colby-Sawyer opponents, soundly defeating them 8-0. Debi Bloom, Nancy Mullen, Sissy Steinbreder, Shelly Hanafee and Barb Hillman all won their respective single matches. The teams of Katherine Stanton and Rebecca Rich, and Deborah Sears and Lisa Reineman both defeated their Colby-Sawyer opponents in doubles.

Cross-country did not fare as well but were good competition when they travelled to Williams College on Wednesday. The final score was 24-34 in favor of Williams. Place finishers for UVM were Carol Degan, 1st, with the time of 13:11 for the 2¼ mile course. Kathy Glenney was third, Bev Howell, 9th, and in 10th and 11th places were Pam Weiss and Jane Griffin, respectively.

Lastly, the UVM soccer team was tied Wednesday when they travelled to Castleton State. Hilary Engisch of UVM scored first, that score coming with 4:30 left in the second quarter. It looked as though UVM would finish their season undefeated and untied, but with only 1:30 remaining in regulation time, Castleton's Laurie Chatey scored. UVM's record for the year is 4-0-1.

UVM Swimmers Swam 44.7 Miles IN In 8.5 Hours

On Sunday October 19th, the UVM Swim Team held its annual fund raising swim-a-thon at Forbush Pool.

Twenty-two swimmers swam two half-hour time slots for a total time in the water of 1 hour for each swimmer. Usually 2 or 3 swimmers would swim each ½ hour time slot. Coach Les Leggett, the first swimmer in the water, started the swim-a-thon at exactly 8 a.m. It concluded 8.5 hours later at 4:30 p.m. after 78,700 yards had been swam.

The purpose of the swim-a-thon was to raise money to augment the swim team budget for 1975-76 season. An estimated $750 to $800 was expected to be raised from pledges.

The Swim Team members, coaches and staff wish to thank the students, faculty and staff at UVM for their supportive pledges. Special thanks should go to the following businesses in the Burlington area for their generous pledges of support:

All American Hero, Bailey's Music Room, Bertha Church Intimate Apparrel, Burlington Grocery, Carbur's Restaurant, Emerald City of Oz, Ltd., Haun Welding Supply, It's Hair, La Pattisserie, Lums, Malcolm G. Sheffield, D.D.S., Millard Fillmore, Pants Plus, P.T. McGuires, Pool World, Rusty Scuffer, Sega Food Service of Vermont, Serendipity, Spillaines Mobil Service Station, The Office, The Pub, The Sting, Tick Tock Shop, University Bookstore, Valuga Sports Shop, What Ales You, Whiting Company, Ziggy's.

Swim team members are currently collecting pledges for laps swam from those who pledged their support. The over-all swim-a-thon appears to be a great success.

Degan Undefeated As X-Country Loses

The UVM Womens Cross-Country team ended their duel meet season last Wednesday with a defeat at the hands of Williams College. Although they had hoped to take the meet, they realized that they will always be up against the tough Williams girls in future meets.

Cross-Country Captain Carol Degan finished the season undefeated, as Williams failed to produce a runner who could beat Degan's dashing time of 13:11. Next for the Cats war Kathy Glenney, with 13:43, who was edged out of second place by a fraction of a second by a Williams runner. Glenney, completing her second year running for UVM, has consistently placed well and is a real asset to the team. Bev Howell, also finishing well, placed ninth with 14:58. Pam Weiss was next in for UVM, placing tenth, with Jane Griffith placing eleventh as fifth woman for the Cats. Freshman runner Joan Griffin placed fourteenth.

The course circled the handsome campus, and included a loop in ankle deep mud on the golf course. The Williams Pep Club tailed the runners in their fire truck, and cheered the women on while informing them of their mile times.

The women runners have several important events still to come, the next being the New England Colleges Championship this Sunday at the University of Massachusetts. The Vermont Collegiate Cross-Country champs hope to, as coach Perry "Jesum Crow" Bland would say, "Have a good one."

THE SPORTS SCENE

by Norm Robinson

An old Western movie adage was "This town ain't big enough for the two of us." In this modern age of big-time professional football, it can be reinterpreted as "this country can't support both of us."

Last week the World Football League collapsed after a 15 month life. With the collapse come hundreds of questions and problems and hopefully a new understanding and realization of the expansion of professional athletics.

The demise of the WFL shows that this country cannot continue to support an endless number of so-called professional teams. What the WFL did was increase players salaries–which isn't bad; and raise ticket prices –, which is. What the non-defunct league didn't do was make a profit. Fan support was horrendous in most cases, and who could blame them. Would you pay to see one or two stars play against lesser talents when you could see the NFL teams perform?

As I see it, professional sports had better look hard and long when they think of expansion. The fan has just so much money that can go into athletics. If sport continues to spread itself thin, it may go under completely.

Not only did the WFL have spectator problems, but TV also failed to become an integral part of the league. All successful leagues have extensive TV coverage which help cover the costs. The financial backing was just not there.

So in capsule summary, the WFL probably hurt professional football. Ticket prices are up because of bidding wars and they won't ever come down. The question now remains, will pro football and other sports learn from the mistakes? Pro basketball is in a near desperate situation as well. The Denver Nuggets and New York Mets of the ABA want to join the National Basketball Association, while many of the other teams flounder in the sea of finance.

The ABA has fared better than the WFL, but is under hard times. The drawing power of the infant league is nowhere near that of the NBA, and finances are meager in most headquarters.

The WFL has folded, and many of the players are out of work, but so are many Americans. It's a fact of life that businesses close and people are out of jobs. The better equipped and more talented people find other employment and this will be the case with football players. The Larry Cronkas, Paul Warfields and others will play football somewhere next year, there's no doubt about that.

It may be that the ABA will also fold. Teams like the Mets and Nuggets could be absorbed into the NBA if they are financially capable of staying afloat. The other teams will fold and the better players will join an NBA team.

Sports can be blown way out of proportion. I'm a sport fanatic like many Americans, and could watch or participate in sports seven days a week and 52 weeks a year, but it must be realized that our economy cannot support an unlimited number of professional teams. Expansion is great if the market is there. There are few markets left that can support a professional sport's program however.

The WFL has given us a chance to reevaluate sports expansion and the ability of the U.S. to support teams. Pro basketball, baseball and hockey had better take heed of the problems of pro football. For myself and millions of Americans, the more sports the better; but, like a glutton, one can get too much of what he or she likes. The demise of the WFL could not have come at a better time. The irony of the situation is that pro football and hopefully other sports are better off with the death of part of it.

A Tribute To Jim Cross Planned

A very unusual and exciting event is being planned for Sunday November 9 at the Roy L. Patrick Gymnasium in honor of Jim Cross, who will soon begin his 11th year as the head hockey coach at the University of Vermont. The dinner, a spontaneous community tribute, will begin at 5 p.m., and tickets are now available for the evening at three locations in the Burlington area.

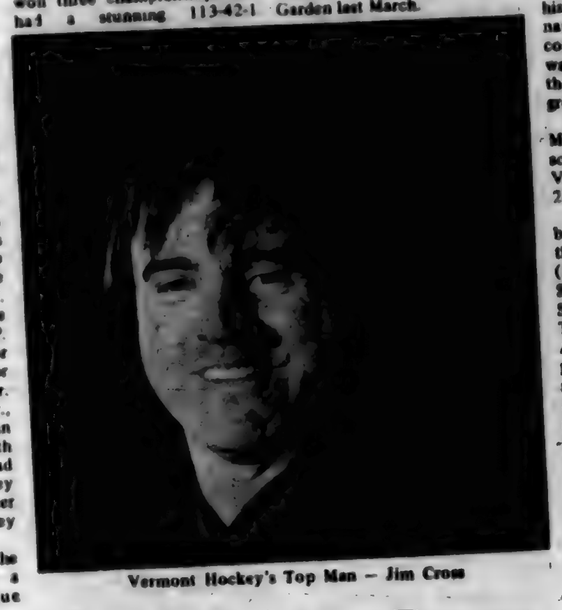
In keeping with the Vermont tradition and the "Cross style", a picnic motif with informal attire will characterize the evening. Hay wagons, pine trees, cider, band stands, a barber shop quartet, etc. will assure a great time for everyone who attends.

The wide-spread respect for Jim Cross as a coach and a teacher of young men has resulted in an impressive group of loyal friends who are returning for the "picnic". Among these friends will be Vermont Governor, Thomas P. Salmon, the former Senator George D. Aiken, former University President, Dr. Edward C. Andrews Jr., two-time UVM All-American goalie, Dave Reece, now with the Boston Bruins, a broad cross-section of youth, hockey players, coaches, and former and current UVM hockey players.

The combination of the informal testimonial and a special and unique commemorative gift for those attending is expected to result in widespread media coverage for the evening.

Jim Cross, UVM's head hockey coach the last 10 years, is ranked fourth among active coaches in winning percentage (.629) and is considered one of the top teachers and innovators in the game. During his nine years in Division II, his clubs won three championships and had a stunning 113-42-1 Division II mark: one of the best ever compiled.

Cross's 1974-75 club astounded Eastern hockey with its third-place finish last year, Vermont's first appearance as a Division I team. Vermont had the most successful inaugural season of any team to move up from Division II, winning 14 of 20 Division I games, including a 7-3 win over Cornell in the consolation game at Boston Garden last March.



Vermont Hockey's Top Man — Jim Cross

While a student at Boston University (Class of 1960), he was a member of the 1960 Terrier squad that qualified for the NCAA's, finishing second to the University of Denver. Cross, 43, also played baseball at Boston University.

He first came to the state of Vermont in 1961 as the Director of Physical Education at Lyman C. Hunt School in Burlington, where he remained until 1965. It was in 1964 that his first big break came, being named the assistant hockey coach at UVM. A year later, he was named the head man, and the program hasn't stopped growing.

A native of Weymouth, Mass., he and his wife, Lorna, a school teacher, live in Fairfax, Vermont, a small community 25 miles north of Burlington.

Tickets for the evening may be purchased in advance at three locations: Patrick Gym (Room 206), the Corner Book Store on Church and College St., Burlington, and the Tip-Top Newsstand, Railroad Ave., Essex Jct. Everyone who purchases an adult ticket will receive a commemorative gift. Adult tickets are $8.50, student tickets are $4.00, and tickets for children under six years of age are $2.00.

Maine Surprise Vermont 1-0

by Randy Briggs

Sometimes one break can decide an athletic contest. Often that break can go to the team that is being outplayed. This is exactly what happened Saturday afternoon at Centennial Field as the University of Maine soccer team surprised the Catamount booters of Paul Reinhardt by the score of 1-0. The loss proved costly as it might deny Vermont the outright Yankee Conference Championship. But hopefully, it will not hurt the Cats' chances for a possible berth in the New England Regional Playoffs.

The first half opened with Vermont forcing the play. They controlled the action from the beginning and had a great scoring chance early but a Dick Whidden shot went just wide of the net. The Catamounts continued their excellent passing and teamwork and continued to pressure the Maine goal. But fine play by the Maine fullbacks and their goalie Phil Torsney kept Vermont at bay.

Although Vermont controlled the action, Maine had a few chances of their own in the opening half. But a couple of shots by Maine's Ed Woodbrey were stopped by Catamount goalie Jim Taft.

Other than these two threats, the Cats defense did not allow Maine to penetrate the Vermont zone very well.

The Cats then began to get many more scoring chances but could not finish off their plays. Gil Low missed on a head shot. A shot by Jim Beal was wide. Then John Koerner and Dick Whidden missed golden opportunities. A couple of Vermont offside calls thwarted a few more possible scoring chances.

Vermont was obviously frustrated by the many near goals but continued the attack and again came very close to scoring. John Koerner drilled a hard shot that hit the top crossbar and bounded straight down. Maine goalie Torsney never touched the ball, but no Vermont player was near to slam in the rebound and the ball was cleared.

With about 3 minutes left in the half, rain began to fall. At this time Maine came back with another great chance of their own. They had a soft shot that hit the goalpost. The ball blooped out in front of the goal where Taft covered up. The first half ended with the score tied at 0-0.

Vermont came out in the second half and continued to put on the pressure. Gil Low had a great scoring chance but a fine save by the Maine goalie thwarted the Cats once again. Both teams seemed to be playing better but it was obvious that Vermont was controlling play. Geoff Greig had a fine scoring attempt but was denied by Torsney. Then Paul Austin had a shot that was just barely deflected over the end line by Torsney.

Maine's Ed Woodbrey who would later score the only goal of the contest had two good shots that Taft saved. But the Cats charged right back and rained shots on the Maine goal. A David Allen shot went high. Dick Whidden missed another great opportunity when his shot went high and wide. John Koerner also missed another great chance. The Vermont offense was again frustrated.

It was at this point that Maine got its break. Maine took advantage of a 2 on 1 break and scored when Ed Woodbrey scored on a long pass from Brian Peterson. Woodbrey dribbled in from the left and Vermont goalie Jim Taft was hesitant whether to stay in the goal or come out and cut down the angle. He came out and Woodbrey went around him and scored on a weak rolling shot. With 6:35 left in the game the Cats trailed 1-0.

Vermont did not let this fact bother them however. They continued to control the action but could not get the ball by Torsney. The Maine score psyched the Black Bears up to the extent that they continued to hustle enough to deny the Cats of any good scoring opportunities.

It was a very tough game for the Cats. They played fairly well but it was obvious that they were not playing up to their potential. Credit must be given to Maine however. They played much better than their 4-6 record would indicate and were very aggressive.

The loss dropped Vermont's mark to 10-2. Vermont may still capture the outright Conference Championship if Rhode Island beats Connecticut in their final conference game. However, the Catamounts are assured of at least a tie for the Conference title. Maine finished with a 2-4 conference record.

Women's Field Hockey Drops Undefeated Middlebury, 3-1

by Kimberly Honza

Plagued by wet weather, two previous attempts at a match with the Middle Panthers were rained out. However, the UVM Catamounts got their chance last Saturday. Although the skies were overcast, the rain held off until the completion of the game.

UVM gained possession early in the game, and maintained it for the greater portion of the first half. Only 1½ minutes into the half, Right Wing Ellie Cook drove a hard shot which deflected off one of the Middlebury defensemen, thus making the score 1-0. Only 30 seconds later, Left Inner Jean Fagins, assisted by Lisa Fernandez (Center Halfback) scored again, making it 2-0 in favor of UVM. The Catamounts dominated the remainder of the half, allowing Middlebury only two shots on goal. Both were saved by Goalie Pam Titus. Goalie Sue Weidman of the Panthers was kept busy by issuing four saves. With only 4 minutes remaining in the half, Middlebury exhibited a sudden surge of power and scored with a drive from left wing, Ellen Fischer.

Starting the second half ahead 2-1, the UVM Catamounts again dominated. An impressive performance from Center Halfback Lisa Fernandez and Defenseman Fran Fried, combined with other outstanding games by the additional team members, made for a winning combination. With thirteen minutes of the second half gone, Sharon Farquharson, Right Wing, scored on a break-away, making it 3-1.

That proved to be the final score of the game. Although Middlebury seemed to come alive after that, and gained possession for the remainder of the game, they were unable to score. The Panthers had several chances on corners, but goalie Pam Titus put in a good game at the nets, having ten saves in the second half.

The downcast Panthers left with their previously unblemished record now at 8-1. They are hoping to regain face on Wednesday, October 29, when the UVM A and B teams travel to Middlebury to make-up the other postponement. After that, UVM travels to URI for a tournament on November 2.

Harriers Post Nine Straight Wins

After starting the season off with a dismal 2-4 record, the UVM Cross Country team has defeated its last 9 competitors, and now sports a 11-4 record. The Cats are the only undefeated team in the Yankee Conference against Conference competition.

Completing the regular season last Saturday with a victory over the University of Maine, the harriers now look forward to three consecutive weekends of Championship Competition. On Saturday, November 1 the Yankee Conference Championships will be held at UMass. Monday November 10, the New England Championship Meet will be run at Franklin Park in Boston, and on Monday November 17 the IC-4A Championships will be at Van Cortland Park, New York City.

Competing in these meets this year will be the most experienced team Vermont has assembled in over a decade. Four of the top five runners are seniors, preparing themselves now for the biggest meets of their lifetimes. They have spent their last four years here at the University training and building and working to attain the peak of their physical abilities going into these next three weeks. Lynn Capen, a senior from Winhall, Vermont, is captain of the team, and has led the team in each meet he has run this year. Lynn spent last summer training in the high altitude of the Rocky Mountains and ran with some of the top runners in the United States. He has come on strong since last year and should be running in the lead pack, competing with the top runners in New England. — Dave Milligan, a junior from Windsor, Vermont, has been second man on the Cats this year. Dave is a strong, consistent runner, and will form the backbone of the team next year. — The Cats' third man is Peter Weith, a senior from Darien, Connecticut. Pete, whose favorite event is the half-mile run, has run cross country the past two years and has excelled there also. Pete finds himself loving the Cross Country season more and more each year. — Howdy Russell, a senior from Hinesburg, Vermont, is fourth man on the team. Howdy has been running stronger with each race this year and will be a key man to Vermont's success in the post-season meets. Bob Stoehr, a senior from New Canaan, Connecticut, is fifth man on the team this year. Bob has been getting stronger each year here at UVM and as fifth man plays an important role in the success of the team. Bob feels he's up to it. Rounding out the top 7 runners on the Varsity team are Dave Elliot, a sophomore from Greenwich Ct., and Dave Raner, from Katonah, New York. Those youngsters have in strength and ability what they perhaps lack in experience.

Coach Bill Nedde in his seventh year of coaching the UVM team is looking towards a second consecutive second place in the Yankee Conference meet behind National power, Massachusetts. — In the New Englands, the Cats again hope to duplicate their seventh place spot out of over 70 teams. This is really quite an accomplishment, when you realize that the only teams that beat the Vermont Harriers last year, received financial aid and scholarships.

No member of the UVM Cross Country Team receives a penny in aid, due to their athletic ability. You might call them the top amateur, collegiate team in New England.

Women's Soccer Ties

by Kimberly Honza

An undefeated UVM Women's Soccer Team travelled to Castleton State last Wednesday, only to return with a 1-1 tie, making their season record 4-0-1.

The team looked impressive, gaining possession early in the game. UVM scored first in the game, that goal coming late in the second quarter on a shot by Hilary Engisch. Castleton goalie, Lisa Lemieux, held the strong UVM offense scoreless for the remainder of the game issuing 13 saves.

The score stayed at 1-0 for the greater portion of the remaining game. Excellent performances by Anne Quantrou, Barb Pulling, Laurel Merrill, and Mary Ellen Auger, combined with an outstanding job by goalie Kerra Desseau, who had 13 saves, held Castleton State scoreless until well into the fourth quarter.

With only a minute and thirty seconds remaining in the game, Castleton player Laurie Chatey scored the final goal of the game, making the score 1-1.

'B' Rugby

The UVM B team defeated the Sienna B team by a score of 13 to 3. Scoring began when scrumhalf Jeff Trevaline ran ten yards for a try. Randy Friedman added the 2 point conversion, making the score 6 to zero. Friedman later converted a penalty kick, leaving the score at halftime at 9 to 0.

The second half saw Sienna score its only points of the day on a 3 point penalty kick. UVM then scored the final points of the game when Trevaline ran 15 yards along the sidelines for another 4 point try. UVM will travel to Northfield Vermont this Saturday to play the Cadets of Norwich.

Credit For OVP Projects

The staff at the Office of Volunteer Programs is available to help you arrange for credit for a service/learning project. Many students who think they don't have any extra time for a "volunteer" project are surprised at the variety of ways that this type of experience can be integrated into their academic program. For example, many projects can be carried out through an independent study course or a readings and research course. It may also be possible for you to take advantage of the off-campus semester. If you wish to make an even greater time commitment to a project, the University Year for Action program is another vehicle through which you can arrange a meaningful complement to your academic program. Stop in at Mansfield House (behind Ira Allen Chapel) and talk with us about your ideas for a service/learning project for next semester.

United Way Day

The Panhellenic Council is sponsoring a bake sale at the University Book Store for the United Way. It will be held on November 12, featuring all sorts of sorority baked goods. Help your munchies...by helping the United Way!

SKI BASH

When the temperature falls below thirty-two degrees, it's time for skiing. All those hoping to get a rush on the early season are invited to attend the Fourth Annual UVM Ski Club Ski Show.

There will be people to meet and movies to see. Many area shops will be there to discuss the newest in Alpine and Nordic equipment, and there will be clinics so you can learn how to care for your equipment. Meet and talk to people from the ski areas and learn what they have planned for the season.

Featured event of the day will be the "Swap Shop." It is a perfect opportunity to buy that equipment you need to make a perfect season or sell the equipment you don't need. Anyone wishing to sell equipment should bring it to the Living/Learning Center Commons between 9:00 a.m. and noon on the day of the show.

It's all happening November eighth, from 1:00 to 8:00 p.m. in the Living/Learning Center Commons at UVM. It's free and everyone is invited, so come on down!

The Exchange

by Alice D. Ostrander
Counseling and Testing

Each week brings some new points that no one on the faculty or administration thinks of and this is the delight of working on THE EXCHANGE. One of the problems this week revolves around the provision of transport from Redstone and the gym to the classrooms. Some study shows that it would be fine and some feel it should be provided. "We need a free or very inexpensive campus bus service... the walk between the commuter parking lots and classrooms is getting colder with winter approaching." This writer is skeptical that any real savings would be effected in the health or in the finances, but it certainly could be considered. We will bring it to the attention of Buildings and Grounds but don't hold your breath waiting for the buses! Many feel one of the charms of the campus is the health engendered by the strolling and some feel it is easy to tell commuters from residents just by their pallor in the face of such a residential glow.

Library space is at a premium and plans have been made for its extension so that more space can be provided for studying and books. The plans are, incidentally, superb and will add a new dimension to the present facilities. Many will remember when Billings was being used as the library and the pride of the campus!!

Some worry about too few things to do on weekends. There really are many activities going on, but many do not advertise as they might. The Cynic needs more information on what is taking place and their deadline is Monday noon before the event occurs. Billings, x2068 always has information on various events. Please keep your suggestions coming – we want to help make the year one of the most fun for us all! Drop them in THE EXCHANGE boxes in Billings, Jeanne Mance, L/L, Simpson or Patterson or call x2068.

German Seminar In LL

The German Haus invites all persons interested in Germany, her language, and culture to come and share travel experiences and Gemutlichkeit with us. We are located in the Living Learning Center, B Building, Suites 200-230, and we are pursuing several group projects, among them the Scholarship Fund.

Dr. Roy Allen of the German Department is organizing an academic seminar in Munich for two weeks during the January intersession. Students participating will receive three credits, and the cost of the trip and the credits is $525.00. The German Haus is well on the way to raising the necessary funds to send one student who meets the academic qualifications and who could not normally afford the trip to the two week Munich seminar.

In addition to selling our home-made pretzels at SA films we will be selling raffle tickets in Billings and the bookstore for $.50 a ticket. If you contribute by buying a ticket, you may be the lucky one to win a complete Cross Country Ski package donated by Eastern Mountain Sports on Dorset St. The second prize is a Steak dinner for two at the Black Angus Restaurant on Rte. 7.

Thursday evenings from 7:00 p.m. to 8:30 we have a conversation session and/or slide show or guest speaker. All are welcome to come and practice their German, and if singing is your thing, join us every Friday from 4:00 p.m. to 5:30 for German Folksinging with Dr. Scrase.

Halloween Party

by Shelley Bouchard

The sisters and new pledges of Delta Delta Delta sorority invaded the medical center hospital of Vt. on Halloween Eve, adorned in the wildest array of costumes ever. The children's ward, orthopedic floors, and nursing home floor delighted in watching these masked mauraders of fun and games parade through the halls. Delta Delta Delta National has been supporting a new philanthropy in recent years – "cancer in children." Each of the campus chapters donates time, effort or monetary consideration in some way to support the cause throughout the school year.

Student Positions Open

Positions are open to students on various committees. These committees are:

1. Faculty Senate Student Affairs Committee – This committee needs students to work with them in solving student problems.
2. Military Studies Sub-Committee – This sub-committee needs a non-ROTC student representative.
3. The Faculty Senate Financial Policy Committee – This committee needs a student representative. This committee is especially important considering the budget crisis now at hand.
4. The Alumni Association – is interested in working with students while they are on-campus.
5. The Traffic Board of Appeals – this board, which reviews appeals of traffic violations, needs two voting student members.

There are many S.A. groups established or being established that need student input, such as S.A. Speakers, and Sex Information Service. Students are also needed to start working on a student review of teachers and courses, a monumental task.

Male Queen

(CPS) -- A male student has been cut from the list of candidates for homecoming queen at Northeast Missouri State University.

Van Harl was dropped from the slate because some student senators thought that a male couldn't be a queen. Although there is no election rule excluding males, senate members thought Harl's entry would insult other candidates.

GEOGRAPHY COURSES

The Department of Geography will offer four special topics courses, all numbered 196, next semester. Two of the courses concern aspects of landscapes and two deal with major regions of the world. "Place Name Geography" will examine the names people have given to their settlements and other features of the landscape, devoting special attention to the spatial and linguistic characteristics of the names as indicators of earlier peoples and their activities. "Landscape Perception" will deal with the ways that various peoples perceive the complex of visible features on the land surfaces around them and especially on how values and attitudes contribute to the creation of symbolic elements in landscapes. The concern of "The Tropics: Amazonia" will be with land and life in one of the most sparsely populated large regions on earth, the Amazon basin in South America. A course entitled the "Middle East" will focus upon the development of the contemporary cultural, economic, and political patterns in the Middle East against a background of the physical and resource base there. Students interested in any of these courses are invited to contact the Department of Geography, room 112 Old Mill, telephone 656-3061.

Patrick Gymnasium. All are invited to attend. There will be no charge for admission and no tickets will be required.

The Richard R. Warner Memorial Speakers Fund was established by Dick's family, friends, and colleagues to honor the late professor of political science who died at the age of 41 in September, 1974. Donations to the Speakers Fund can be forwarded to Professor Alan Wertheimer, Department of Political Science, UVM.

Mr. Wicker will be the guest at an open house at the home of Martha Warner, One Longmeadow Drive, Shelburne, from 3:30 to 5:00 on November 12th. Interested students and faculty are invited to attend.

International Club to Meet

There will be a General Meeting of The International Club held on Wednesday, November 13 at 4:30 p.m. directly following the regular Coffee Hour at 3:30 p.m. at the Center for Area and International Studies, 479 Main Street.

The purpose of this meeting shall be for the Club to reorganize itself at this time.

Included on the agenda will be the election of two new officers, ratification of proposed changes to the Club's constitution, and discussion of tentative plans for this year's activities.

The purpose of The International Club is to promote mutual understanding among international students. The Club especially welcomes foreign students as well as American students who have an interest in foreign students or in travel/study abroad or who have just returned from an overseas experience and would like to share it with others.

Anyone who is interested in joining The International Club or who would like to contribute ideas and opinions or have an influence on the direction of this year's activities is urged to attend this very crucial meeting.

Cynic Has Editor Needs

All persons, experienced or inexperienced, are encouraged to work for the Cynic. A variety of positions always need to be filled. These positions include reporters, writers, researchers, and lay-out personnel, as well as other interesting jobs which can be tailored to suit the needs and interests of the student. The only requirement is that students be interested and motivated. Editors are eager to work with writers to develop writing skills and journalistic technique. Editors also understand the often constricting workloads of many students and make conscious efforts not to pressure personnel. Interested persons are encouraged to visit the Cynic office located in the Billings Center basement. Phone: 658-4911.

Cynic editorial positions are available for the 1976 school year. Editorships are available in News, Feature, Arts and Entertainment, and the Sports department, in addition to chief, managing, assistant and copy editor positions. These positions are open to the entirety of the UVM undergraduate community. They are positions of responsibility and are relatively time-consuming. Three credits are optional. Editors are elected by the current staff for the upcoming year. Elections will be held Thursday evening, November 13th. Interested students should inform the Cynic staff of their candidacy before the scheduled election by signing up in the Cynic office. Again, editorships are open to all who are interested. Dubious persons are strongly encouraged to consult the current editorial staff.

They are in need of some items such as a large coffee pot, popcorn popper, items for creative work such as paints crayons, paper, etc, cards and games. If you can be of assistance in any way, please contact the center.

The Alabama Project sponsored by the Center has been and continues to be a community project, and it can be realized only because of the interest and support of the many people who make up the Newman Center Community. We have already received response in terms of a successful bake sale and in terms of the number of students willing to give time and effort during Semester Break to the underprivileged in the Mobile, Alabama area.

If any person is interested in helping this worthwhile cause in any way, please contact Fr. Holland at the Center.

The Protestant, Episcopal and Catholic Ministries on campus are sponsoring a Thanksgiving Service at St. Anselm's Chapel, Redstone Campus on Thursday, November 20 at 10:00 p.m. Please join us for prayer, song and meditation in gratitude for all our blessings and in awareness of the needs of others.

What are you doing after graduation? Interested in giving one year or two of contributed services to Church-related work in the Diocese of Burlington or elsewhere? A group of students has expressed a desire to do this as an alternative to other volunteer programs (Vista, Pavla). Perhaps some of you would like to join them. If so, please contact Fr. Holland. Areas of service could include ministry to youth in parishes, social work, visiting the poor and sick, adult education, campus ministry, office work. Possibilities are endless and suggestions are welcome.

St. Anselm's Chapel

Religion Suite? Some religion majors and other students are interested in exploring the idea of a suite for next year in the Living/Learning Center. You are invited to an exploratory meeting on Friday, November 14, at 4:00 p.m. in the Religion Building, Room 201.

The theme for the suite is still very fluid. One thought is to focus on ritual in contemporary religious life. The forms (old and emerging), the power, existential significance, and personal value of rituals of all kinds. This study could also include the pseudo-religious rituals of the profane culture (drugs, sex, modern music, art, dance, etc.) The general aim is to understand and encounter the phenomenon of ritual. People living in the suite may create and experiment with their own forms of ritual by participation and practice to supplement the theoretical observance and study of ritual. There may be better ideas if we brainstorm it. This is open to non-religion majors, too.

Between now and the meeting, if you wish to discuss the subject contact Mr. Gussner in the Religion Building, 2nd floor or John Kramer, 17-Robinson Hall.

A Dangerous Situation

Through the estensive lobbying efforts of the Administration, UVM has been saddled with the pedestrian tunnel. Students were informed that this was done for their own benefit so that a dangerous crossing would be made safe for them. That decision has been made, and there is no course of action that can overturn it.

However, while the tunnel is being constructed to insure our safety, a more dangerous situation than ever exists at the L/L crossing. Where the lights at the crossing used to turn red for pedestrians, it now only flashes yellow. This is supposed to be a warning to slow down but is largely ignored by Burlington drivers.

It is a wonder that the Administration doesn't utilize its great lobbying efforts to rectify this situation at once. They are supposed to be concerned about student safety, yet they allow a potentially dangerous situation in which students must cross a highway without the benefit of a red light. Admittedly, most of us are young, have good eyesight and quick reflexes. However, the handicapped and those temporarily disabled often must wait for the kindness of a motorist to let them pass, which is not easy to come by, especially during the rush hours.

Whoever made the decision to turn off the lights is not significant. What is important is that the administration, which seems to have considerable political clout, has done nothing to insure the student's safety at the present. Future safety considerations are essential, but they would be of little concern to a student who is killed or maimed because of the lax safety measures at the L/L intersection. If there is a justifiable reason why the red light has been turned off, the students should be informed. If not, then the problem that exists should be solved at once.

Support Dr. Kidder

To the Editor:

I have been reading about the activities of the Search Committee involved in the selection process for the next President of the University. It is my conclusion that the energies being exerted in interviewing the out-of-state candidates is indeed being wasted when, in fact, there is an extremely well qualified Vermonter who has applied for the position. Dr. Harley Walter Kidder knows the ins and outs of this university like no other man or woman. He could start his tasks immediately, while the other potential people would be taking months if not years to learn the ropes of this position.

Dr. Kidder has some concrete proposals which should be seriously considered by the university community. He proposes the reinstitution of the football program through a voluntary contribution campaign. He advocates the removal of several high ranking administrators who simply add to the high costs of running this school. Dr. Kidder is a man who clearly and succinctly states his points of view and who implements his philosophy through viable programs. Here is a man who is responsive to the economic throes of our times. He nonetheless feels that tuition for both in and out of staters can be reduced along with the outrageous salary that is offered the President of this institution.

I call for student body support for the candidacy of Dr. Kidder. There is absolutely no need for the time and expense currently employed searching for the ideal leader of this school when a native son looms on the horizon ready, willing, and able to assume the post.

Let's inform the Search Committee and the Board of Trustees members that Dr. Kidder can get the job done.

Poor Planning By SA

To the Editor:

This Friday, November 7, SA will be bringing the NEW RIDERS OF THE PURPLE SAGE to UVM. Unfortunately, there seems to have been a lack of insight in the planning of this concert.

It is hard to believe that, with all the planning that goes into scheduling a concert, the NEW RIDERS could have been scheduled the same night as Chick Corea, the Lane Series Performer. Unfortunately for SA there seems to be much more enthusiasm for the Chick Corea performance. While Chick Corea is nearly sold out, the NEW RIDERS have a long way to go. Therefore it appears that with the limited time remaining, ticket sales for the NEW RIDERS will not be good. The loss incurred by SA on this concert may be enough to make it the first and the last concert this year.

In the future it will be a good idea to check a calendar before scheduling a concert. If there is an important event that night, find a free night and then have a concert. Hopefully this blunder will make SA aware of this basic scheduling rule.

Vietnam After Victory

To the Editor:

As someone who also attended Ms. Laura Whitehorn's presentation of Vietnam after Victory, I find it necessary to respond to Ms. Randy Gellerman's interpretation of the event, which appeared in the Cynic on October 30.

Although it is hard to ignore the United States government's role in the Vietnam War the slides and discussion dealt mainly with the positive aspects of the Vietnamese society and how the people were rebuilding their lives in a time of peace. I find their courage and dedication to the principles of "sharing", "communal spirit", and "community" in this process as quite inspirational to any American movement for social change. Any success in that area is something to aspire to.

It didn't appear to me that blame for the "Vietnam tragedy" was being placed, by the speaker, on any American institution or any individuals, but on an expansionist policy that supported the bombing and aggressive actions of our government. Ms. Whitehorn stated that the people she met, in Vietnam, made the distinction between the people of this country and the policies of our government, and that they conveyed good wishes and gratefulness for the work we did in ending the war.

There are many differences between our two peoples and cultures; and it would be naive to think we could use another society as an example to learn from without understanding these differences; but we could certainly look at it in that context.

The slides and discussion didn't appear to me as a "tirade" drawing from negative energy, but a presentation of the situation in North Vietnam today, drawing its energy from love and admiration of that struggle and the people who survived it.

And back at home Vietnam is not a dead issue; for the victory there symbolizes an end to an era of American domination in the world. We have to reexamine our role and understand the economic and cultural reasons we acquired that role. By doing this, we are not making the US a scapegoat or harping on our failures, but beginning to look at ourselves and how we have to change.

I don't consider myself a recipient of "political pap", or taken in by others, but rather as someone who sees herself as part of a movement to build a more sane, non-oppressive, less hypocritical society in this country. I share Ms. Gellerman's idealism and need for a vision in making a revolution. I also realize that we are not isolated from the influence of the society we condemn, having been a product of its socialization process. The political, economic and social forces continue to pull and push us in powerful ways. To move against those forces requires almost superhuman energy. It therefore, is no surprise that the American left would have many of the same faults that the larger society possesses. We are products of our environment struggling to both change ourselves and that environment.

Sincerely
Joyce Bressler

EMS Made Honest Mistake

To Elwood Johnston and the Cynic:

It is apparent that you have been hasty in making your accusations before acquainting yourself with all the facts.

When you were in Eastern Mountain Sports pricing cross country skis, we still had our 'low' Spring-Summer prices in effect. It is our practice to hold Summer prices until the Fall-Winter catalogue arrives in our shop, and when it does, in mid-September, we adjust our prices accordingly. The October sale prices reflect reduction in the 1975-76 Fall-Winter prices.

Eastern Mountain Sports does not deal underhandedly with its customers. My employees have always been instructed to give as much accurate information as they can, and it is unfortunate that you may have been given misinformation at the time—but it was an honest mistake and should have been taken as such.

Our prices are not "high"; they are quite competitive. We have always made our extensive catalogue file available to our customers, and we invite anyone to peruse it for comparative shopping.

And to the Cynic, I must say that its sensationalist lead to Mr. Johnston's letter — "E.M.S. Underhanded" — was both unwarranted and arbitrary.

Women's Year Cover

To the Editor:

I read the Cynic very much and enjoy it but I did not enjoy the front cover of Oct. 23, 1975.

It's great that you acknowledged women's year but don't you think that a woman should have drawn the picture on the front page rather than Kenny Mirman.

Also it seems to be more of a sex symbol picture than anything else. So if you're going to do a picture of women, why don't you show them for what they are and not what Kenny thinks they look like.

Thanks much,
Ruben Yownca

Editor's note: The Oct. 23, 1975 cover was adapted from the official cacheted envelope for the First Day Cover of the International Women's Year postage stamp.

Accuser's Dance No. 1 and 2

I tried to placate the accuser's dance
But they kept on dancing out all of the aches of their days.
And their ears were deaf to my voice.
And their eyes were blind to my image.
Only the accusing music regally thrilled their veins
To a wild minuet in the Night.
They spun around in sweeping circles cutting
Patterns in the woods below the piney night.
Pain was in their countenance
As they shadowed snatches of facial remorse.
They portrayed their penitence
As actors forgotten of their own personalities.
They were filled with the worth of yesterday.
And they hesitated the night from giving birth
To unproven tomorrow, and they accused us all
To sorrow.
Fall tumbling spirits now in wet sweat dripping
Stripling sinewy saplings acting mid-wife to the Night.
So among us should have moved watching educated
Movement emoting feeling
Pith pores sapped and pumping human beings
Filled us all in the woods in the night
They were challenging Gods to dance in their own image.
To dance abandoned steps long since forgotten.
To dervish through the empty beds of streams
And circuit through the hills to meet them
There, the judges of the piney forest night.
Each one of them accused a separate one
Of each of seven starry hosts.
No smiles, no mocking led them there to boast.
Teeth bared and task disdainful yet
Involuntary dancing by the night. No part
Of the dance could be remembered moving swiftly
To the next and constantly wild swirling
To new text.
And then the old accuser made
A breech to falling feet. He separated tangled Limbs, to speak his oath to trees and water,
Men and beasts and everything that flew.
"When no longer can my thick tongue sing of the sinewy stains of time,
And boney poetry lies aside no longer bleeching words from slime,
Let then and only then this rhyme infuse me with this cursed dance.
It's then when severed profiles slice the sky on windy crag.
And mathematic computations lie there in the slag.
And only those who've made it there can stay
To let their bodies writhe until the day.
Should that day come we all are doomed
By a lesser God than any here accused,
Then death to speech and books amid the ooze.
And from that pinnacle no longer stray.
Resign yourself to dance the days away."

No Smoking ?

To the Editor:

I am both amazed and appalled at the recent developments in Cambridge, Mass. where smoking has now become outlawed in public areas. This is a fine example of a rapidly growing trend in the U.S. with which I disagree violently.

The American Cancer Society has used one of the greatest and yet most dangerous of all tools, that of mass media, to effectively convince the people of their inalienable (though once, never in a million years imagined) rights. I am furious that because of this campaign, and only because of this campaign, one TV generation baby will demand that I extinguish my cigarette at the same time their hostess is serving them refined sugar products, processed cheeses and white, Kleenex tasting "enriched" bread. Had the American Heart Association launched a similiar advertising stunt, no doubt I would soon be unable to purchase french pastries and Jiffy peanut-butter. But until these same people who claim "Non-Smokers Rights" demand that Kellogg's cereals be outlawed as well, I will continue to smoke anywhere I please. To see the great effect of advertising makes me sad but to see the inconsistencies in some people's reasoning makes me give up hope.

At this point I am reminded of something Kurt Vonnegut once told me. When that great General Electric wizard Charles Proteus Steinmetz came to work one morning to find "No Smoking" in his private laboratory, he put up a sign which said "No Steinmetz" ...and he went home.

Food For Thought

To the Editor:

A few thoughts on vegetarians and vegetarianism. This movement has been one which has done good for many people. Making us aware of how costly meat really is and how badly it is manufactured in this country and others has caused me to slow down my consumption and turn more and more to vegetables which I always liked but used to place second to good old meat.

However, this vitriolic campaign by the holier than thou slayers of vegetables and other non-meat edibles is tiring and morally missing a few cogs. Reverence for life? Are plants a lower form than animals? Do you know a plant's reactions to being slayed? What else would an animal be to make it alright to kill it? Are the microscopic cells you devour in fresh water not a high enough form to worry about? Some real food for thought.

Before moving from the ridiculous to the sublime, a more modest moral suggestion is offered. Part of life is dying. Part of living is taking and giving. Everything serves its purpose from the tiny one celled "thing" which is neither plant nor animal right on through to our complex bodies. Someday we will be worm food and the stuff out of which beautiful trees and gardens will grow. Nature doesn't question this process. Why do we? Guilt for the way we have lorded it over the rest of the world and wrecked havoc? Probably. But not eating meat is not the answer. Sensible eating is.

Peace to all my vegetarian friends.

VPIRG Column — The Drug Price Ripoff

by Peter Cobb

The prescription drug business is big business. Americans spend over five billion dollars annually for prescription drugs. This does not include the billions spent for the over-the-counter goodies such as aspirin and cough syrup. Along with the soft drink industry, drug manufacturers have consistently turned in the highest profits of any industry in the country. Their profits are nearly two times higher than other manufacturers.

There are two important reasons for their higher than average profits. First, they do not have to compete by producing a lower priced product. Most states do not allow price advertising by drug stores which eliminates price shopping by consumers. Also many drugs are protected by patent laws making price competition unnecessary.

The drug companies also conduct expensive high pressure advertising campaigns geared towards high profits. Pharmaceutical companies spend over one billion dollars annually ($400,000 in Burlington) pushing their product. Eighty percent of the money pays for "detail men." The Detail men are salespersons hired to promote their employers' products to the doctors. These highly paid drug pushers offer free samples and bonus gifts to doctors who promise to prescribe their brand. Physicians are often guilty because they rarely seek price information from the manufacturers and are unable to evaluate the "education" they receive from the salesmen.

Once a doctor is hooked by the detail man, it is easy street for the drug company. The physician will consequently prescribe the company's brand to the hundreds of patients who need the drug. Needless to say, the cost of the advertising is passed on to the consumer. In fact, about 25% of the retail cost of brand name prescriptions are due to the advertising expenses.

GENERIC DRUG LAW

One potential means of lowering prescription drug prices in Vermont would be the passage of a controlled substitution law. Such a law would allow a pharmacist to substitute a lower priced generic drug for costly brand name drug, where the generic drug is chemically, biologically and clinically equivalent.

At present, generic substitution is against the law. For example, a druggist may not substitute tetracycline, the generic name for a broad spectrum antibiotic, for Achromycin, which is the brand name for tetracycline, even though the same quality and quantity of tetracycline costs $3.50 while Achromycin costs $4.50. Detail men spend months convincing doctors to prescribe by the brand name. Drug companies also have spent thousands of dollars lobbying to insure that generic substitution legislation does not pass through the Vermont General Assembly.

WHAT CAN THE CONSUMER DO?

There are three things consumers can do to help keep their drug prices down. First shop around, do not assume that the prices at one drug store are the same at another. In a survey conducted by VPIRG in 1973, the results revealed price variations on certain drugs ranging from 450% between the highest and lowest priced stores.

Second, ask your doctor to write your prescription using the generic drug name. In that way the pharmacist is able to fill your prescription with the generic drug or brand name equivalent that is the lowest in price.

Third, urge your local representative to work actively for a drug substitution law. This action would counter some of the high pressure tactics of the drug companies detail men.

Frat Frolics Offend Blacks, Women, Bear

by Anthony Schmitz

(CPS) – A mood on campus that's "more conducive to fun" has been the root of a 30% membership increase for the country's fraternities, according to a national fraternity chapter. But some of the fraternity fun has left blacks, women and a bear in the nation's colleges unamused.

Blacks in DeKalb, Il. were incensed after fraternity members hung a statue of a black lawn coachman from the window of the Phi Kappa Theta house at Northern Illinois University (NIU). Student Affairs Vice-President Harry Canon said that in addition to the lawn coachman, a sign on the door of the fraternity had a picture of a burning cross and the letters KKK printed on it.

Canon, who called the display distinctly racist, asked the fraternity to make an apology to NIU's black community. The fraternity refused.

A NIU commission is studying the case and reviewing testimony.

New Mexico State University co-eds were seething early in October over a fraternity stunt they considered derogatory to women. Members of the school's Interfraternity Council had placed two large balloons depicting breasts on the second floor of a University building. A sign below the balloons read, "If you like these mountains, then go to A Mountain tomorrow." Fraternity members at the school paint an "A" for Arizona on a nearby mountain each year.

A woman history instructor at the University called the display asinine and offensive to women, while another University woman said it was "an obvious indication of the way in which fraternity men regard women. They view them as sexual objects."

After a protest by students and faculty members, fraternity members removed the balloons, although one member observed that "it did the thing it was intended to do, and that was to get a large amount of attention."

In Ohio, a bear was the victim of Greek hijunks. Members of the Alpha Chi Omega sorority opened their door one morning in September and found a decapitated and badly mutilated young bear on the porch. The bear was placed on the sorority porch by members of a neighboring fraternity. Fraternity members said the bear was left on their porch during the night. The Ohio Department of Wildlife is considering taking legal action in the case.

In spite of these and other incidents on college campuses, membership in fraternities has increased steadily since a low point hit in 1969 and 1970.

A yearly survey by the national Interfraternity Conference (NIC) shows that since a membership upswing in 1973, membership has jumped by about 30%. There is an average of 42 members at each of the 4500 fraternity chapters in the U.S. and Canada.

Comparable figures show that sorority membership is up by about 4% since last year.

A national officer of the Zeta Psi Fraternity of North America said the reason for increased membership is that "the mood on campus has changed to one more conducive to fun. We're not being as heavy as we were during the war."

Another reason is that during the period of campus unrest in the late '60's and early '70's, "it wasn't popular to belong to much of anything. It's all right today, it's an accepted campus situation," according to NIC director Jack Anson.

Other reasons for increased membership include a shorter probation period for pledges and a decline in hazing, Anson said. He added that he "wouldn't say there isn't any hazing going on anymore."

Neither would Bill Conrad, an Alpha Chi Rho fraternity member in Bethelehem, Pa. Although hazing is illegal in a number of states and violates rules of most fraternities, Conrad claimed to have been tied, wrapped in a sheet and placed in a car. Conrad escaped, and police said later that his shirt was torn and he was bruised.

Conrad called police and told them he saw another sheet wrapped body in the back of the car also. No charges were filed by Conrad or other students involved in the incident.

Looking For Louise on a Cold, Windy Day — Part V

by Gregory Katz

Well, getting a job was one thing. And going out and working it was another. My boss' name was Hank Chinooski, and once I got over his pathetic face and bedraggled manner I realized he was alright. He was a Polish immigrant who had arrived in America broke in '46. Somehow or other the road he took led him to Vermont. He had tried it all, hustling here and there for some kind of security. In Pittsburgh he had his face scalded in the steel mill. That was how his face acquired those pits and valleys. Seems that hot stuff just sprayed out at him one day. He was lucky in a way, for nothing had gotten in his eyes. From Pittsburgh he went to L.A., working on some railroad gig. He spent the early fifties as a brakeman. It was dangerous work, and not very romantic. Lots of people think of the railroad as some sort of glamorous American job, the silver spike, the meeting of the magic rails that span our country, linking L.A. to New York in one cable. Hank told me that was bullshit. Every day he went out and hassled with those huge switches and gigantic metal couplings. He risked his body every day for the Southern Pacific. Then he got sick of it one day and quit. He rode east on his rail pass and got a job in Boston driving a Greyhound between Boston and Montreal. In '65 he got propositioned by some Harvard boys who wanted him to bring hash from Montreal across the border. He turned them in, and got a citation for merit beyond the call of duty.

And then some guy called him at home one night promising to blow up his house the next day. Seems those Harvard boys were part of some larger riff. Well Hank didn't really want to die, not just yet. So he quit the Greyhound job, gave back his citation award, and drove to Vermont. Then he was in the same spot I was, looking in the Free Press for work. Any kind of work. Hank told me he rented a room in the YMCA for two months till he made enough dough to rent a place of his own. And yup, that job was pizzaman at "Hollow Man Pizza". Now ten years later he was boss, owner, and had his own little office. And a beard and a face that frightened little kids.

He was o.k., however Hollow Man Pizza stunk. It was designed to be sort of a call-in restaurant where people could call in a pizza at any hour and have it delivered to their door by the brigade of Hollow Man Delivery Men. The entire restaurant was about forty feet square. There was no place for anyone to eat. The whole operation had almost no overhead, since there were no waiters or amenities to make the place bearable. The working space was a sheer wall of ovens, set at 550F, and a long table where you rolled out the dough and filled the shells with sauce and cheese. Then there was an icebox where the toppings were kept, and a rack of sinks for cleaning. It was shaped like a square, and from the inside all I could see was machines. There was a telephone where I took orders, and a little ledge where I slid out the pizzas, in neat cardboard boxes with the "Hollow Man" sketched on the top. On the other side of the ledge, presumably, were the delivery men who took the steamy little marvels to our clients waiting for them. I never saw the delivery men, and I was convinced they had to be robots. They never spoke to me, never joked or passed the time talking about sports or girls. I would slide the pizzas out and they would disappear.

When I stuck out my hand and received Hank's solemn pronouncement that I "had myself a job" I had no idea just what it would be like. There was that uncertainty that feels so good sometimes. But I found out quickly enough. He gave me the 8-4 shift. On at eight at night and off at four a.m. It's hard for you to visualize what hours like that will do to your relationship to the rest of society. I would get on at eight and be overwhelmed with dinner calls until eleven or so. Then the calls would slow to a trickle, and then practically stop past 12:30. One or two would come in every half hour. And I would sit there watching the clock go around, waiting for four. Those last three hours were so slow, and I was always too frazzled from the dinner rush that all I could do was sit on the counter and try to let go.

The first day on the job it was evident that I had never made a pizza before in my life. Those five years at Chapel St. sounded good, but they didn't help much. I would roll the dough out all wrong, either stretching it too thin, or getting its shape so convoluted that it would never fit on the round pan. Then there was the question of speed. Between eight and nine we would get up to 20 orders. Each one took me about ten minutes to roll out. And I got so flustered that I blew most of the toppings, sending out double cheeses to people expecting pepperoni and onions. I didn't care, I just swore at the ovens and waited for Chinooski to walk in and fire me.

He never did.

Chinooski was never there after dark. For all I know he was never there in daylight. I think his goal was to have the whole operation so synchronized that he became unnecessary. It was sort of like a windup clock. Hank wound it up and then walked away, confident that the gears would mesh smoothly. His optimism was unfounded. He had inadvertently hired a novice and put him smack in the middle of the vital dinner rush. And alone in the kitchen there was no one to correct my mistakes or work on my techniques. Making pizza is, after all, a delicate operation requiring great dexterity and dedication. And I lacked sorely on both counts.

Maybe that was why the delivery men game me the silent treatment. I had them so off-schedule that their tips suffered greatly. Mrs. Hoenig was not likely to be generous to a man who delivered two plain pizzas half an hour late while her six kids sat at the table waiting for their pepperoni specials. In fact sometimes they got sent back with the pizzas. Then the delivery boys just shoved them back through the ledge at me, like they were garbage.

I admit it. I ate them. When those empty hours stretched out I would open the cardboard boxes and go through the contents. At first it was hard to eat a whole pizza by myself. As the weeks went on it became routine. As time passed I became more adept at the whole business. I learned how to roll the dough out, fast and round almost every time. My fingers pinched up the dough to form the ridge that kept the sauce and cheese inside the crust. My hands dropped cheese out over the sauce in quick, fluid motions. I could do more than one thing at a time, and sometimes even had a minute or two during rush hours to get a breath of fresh air. I would open the refrigerator and stick my head in, gulping at the coldness. It was a good way to escape the liquid heat that flowed out of the ovens whenever I opened them.

Once I learned the job, however, I had already learned to hate it. Working from 8 to 4 caused great strain in my life. I would get off work at 4 with a feeling that the whole world was resting and here I was walking down the streets looking for something to do. There wasn't a whole lot to do. I spent a lot of time walking off my energy. One night the moon was big and I went down a long road to a park by the lake. It was one of the few places where you could actually get to the lake. Along the road were big oil tanks all filled and protected by barbed wire. They were lit by the moon and looked like big metal robots. I guess they were sleeping. When I got to the lake I watched the moon sparkle off the water. Then I heard voices.

One of the tankers was offshore, about 200 yards out. I could actually hear the boat droning. The men were all wide awake and pulling hard on some ropes. I saw them clearly in the moonlight. It sounded like they were singing.

"You bastards!" I yelled as loud as I could. "You slimy refinery creeps." They heard me, but they didn't care. I could hear a deep thumping noise. What were they doing to the lake? I don't know for sure. It sounded like some kind of dredging operation. There was a long cylinder coming off the edge of the tanker going down into the lake. Men were pulling at it, their faces numb with cold.

At the edge of the beach was a small motorboat. It must have been how they got to and from the tanker when the shifts changed. Christ. Couldn't they even let the lake sleep? What did they want in her dark waters? I got in the boat.

"I'm coming to get you suckers. It's all over now." I pulled hard on the drawstring and the motor caught with a loud whirr. I hit the throttle. Whiiesshh. The props caught on the sand for a second, then released. I was off into the deep water.

All of a sudden they decided to take me seriously. A big light went on in the front. It swiveled around and caught me full on. My eyes were blinded. Some big voice came out over the water. "Halt. Who are you? Do not come any further!"

I wasn't exactly in my right mind. Too many pizzas or something. I imagined machine guns swirling in their furrets, zeroing in on me opening fire... my gut riddled with bullets... but nothing like that really happened. With the glare of the light I couldn't steer too good, so I headed straight for the light. "I'm coming you bastards." Right then I stalled and sort of coasted into the side of the tanker. The whole boat stank of oil and had this other smell, this putrid thing that I didn't know for sure. The man in charge looked down at me from the prow, and said something to another guy. I felt rather foolish coasting there in the waves made by the tanker. I tried the drawstring. No luck.

The men from the Coast Guard didn't really know what to make of me. I told them I was a pizzaman who loved the lake, and thought that she should be able to sleep at night. I didn't like all those noises disturbing her.

The sergeant at the station didn't understand either. I think he thought I was part of a plot to sabotage Mobil Oil. He threw me in the tank on a tentative charge of industrial espionage.

Record Review: Procol's Worst

by Ron Tapper

Procol's Ninth
Chrysalis 6498

Procol Harum has always been very special to me. Their ability in blending Rock with Classical Baroque music has long made them one of the most adept and inventive bands on the contemporary music scene. The substance of which their songs are made: dying, mystery, nightmares, seas, and madness transcends their audiences beyond familiar limits. So intense is their delivery, that it is almost as though the performers embark on each song as on a mysterious nocturnal voyage. In this way, Procol Harum has always been Avant Garde. However, those days are gone. The individuality and creative aspects of the group has greatly diminished to a state of oblivious mediocrity.

Procol Harum's ninth album could very well be their worst. The lyrics of Keith Reid has become as pretentious as Gary Brooker's music predictable. The best cut on the album is called "I Keep Forgetting" which happens to be one of the few cuts not written by the group. Only one cut even resembles Procol's original style ("The Final Thrust"). All is not lost. Mick Grabham comes through on guitar (he's picked up where Robin Trower left off). The combination of Gary Brooker's soaring vocals and B.J. Wilson's powerful drumming ranks with the best in all of Rock.

In all fairness, the album is not all that bad. I just might be somewhat bias. When a group emerges with brilliance, then you can't get any better. Anything less than brilliance comes as a let down. Despite all this, the album just doesn't make it. It leaves much to be desired.

Leo Kottke, Pop Virtuoso

Pop guitarist and vocalist Leo Kottke, now on the brink of stardom, will perform in the Lane Series on Thursday, November 13, at 8 p.m. in Memorial Auditorium.

Opening the evening's concert will be a local ensemble, the Pine Island String Band.

Leo Kottke is best known for his top-selling album Ice Water. Recognized as a definitive 12-string guitar stylist, Kottke has also cut 6-and-12 String Guitar, Circle 'round the Sun, Mudlark, Greenhouse, My Feet Are Smiling, and Dreams and All That Stuff.

Kottke, along with fellow guitarist Fahey and Basho, has refined the instrument beyond Appalachian and Southern folk forms to free it from the limitations of conventional two-and-three fingered picking and strums. The result has been a new tradition of extended compositions and the short but complete melodies for which Kottke is especially famed.

Writing in the Rolling Stone Tom Murtha says that Kottke has become "what is known in the 'biz' as a 'solid product.' That means that his recordings will never lose money, because he is not a 'pop star,' but a 'virtuoso' by prevailing critical classification.

"Or," continues Murtha, "if you like classifications, here's a new one: pop virtuoso. That means people are beginning to realize he is not only a definitive 12-string guitar stylist but also, 'hey, pretty fast.' Presumably, this will free him to add a gold record to his wall every few months, with cutouts and finally reissues bringing up the rear."

Leo on stage communicates an oblivious sort of intimacy, involvement with his instrument and the individuals in the audience. "I'd like to think that all share one idea through the spag," he says. Sometimes he forgets himself and falls off his stool.

His music can now be heard on many TV and radio programs, providing the sound track for "Thought for the Day" on New York's WHN, "Sermonette" in Dallas, the morning commuter traffic report in Boston, and "The Dating Game" on national TV.

When not concertizing or cutting records, Kottke spends most of his time at his lakeshore home in a Minneapolis suburb, Minnetonka. He has recorded or mixed his last three albums at Minneapolis' Sound 80 Studio, where he recorded Dreams and All That Stuff for Capitol.

Speaking of his Minneapolis home, Kottke says, "Something I read... Thomas Mann...something about creativity being generated by contrasts. In this case, the seasons. People who have put up with that kind of winter here in Minnesota have to possess a certain kind of temperament. When the spring comes, it's like a surge, and you get up and ride that wave. And when the winter comes, there's like this tinkling all around your brain and everywhere, and you sit back and ruminate."

Last summer he gave concerts in Germany that were attended by thousands of people, and in May he appeared before an audience of 3500 in Felt Forum in New York, along with Procol Harum.

Tickets for the Kottke concert, $3.50, $5.50, and $6.50, are on sale in the Lane Office, 234 Waterman. For reservations, telephone 656-3418.

Next on the Lane Series is Preservation Hall Jazz Band on November 19 in a Friends of the Lane Series benefit concert. Tickets are now available.

Good tickets for the Return to Forever jazz ensemble concert, featuring Chick Corea on the keyboards, are still available in the Lane Office, 234 Waterman. The concert will be held on Friday, Nov. 7, at 8 p.m., in Memorial Auditorium. Tickets are $3.50, $5.50 and $6.50.

Space Odyssey: The Last Record Album

by Paul Prior

Before getting to the feat of the matter in this week's melange of words, just a short comment or two on the impending Dylan appearance in fabulous B-Town. Sure, he's as much myth as reality, and is literally worshipped by his fans. Sure, he's appearing with Joan Baez, and reportedly Roger McGuin. Sure, $8.50 is steep for an evening of songs, if you worship Dylan, I'm sure it will be more than worth it. The point is that Dylan hasn't written first rate songs for a number of years, nor has Baez. And Joan can even sing---Just seems like so much hype and tripe over an aging hero, that it really makes me think twice about the state of music today, I just keep asking myself "What next?" Who writes songs about greed and hypocrisy anyways??

Didja ever have one of those weeks? In the course of a week is it possible to have the mid-semester-lost my lady-fifteen years on the root canal-codeine-retchin' blues?? Only one thing could get anyone through such doldrums---THE LAST RECORD ALBUM from LITTLE FEAT. Feat Fans will be dancing in the streets and seeing mirages in their garages. It's been over a year since FEATS DON'T FAIL ME NOW was released, and Fans had to be content with session work done by Lowell George (just a fat kid from L.A.) and Robert Plamer's Sneakin' Sally Through the Alley, on which Feat played back-up.

Since the FEATS DON'T FAIL ME NOW album was fairly rocked-out, (boogied your speakers away) it comes as a surprise that THE LAST RECORD ALBUM is fairly slow and bluesy. It would be no exaggeration to say that in the forty or fifty times I've played this album since last Monday, it has definitely grown on me. The material is quite varied, there are some movers on the disk, not out and out boogie, but the unmistakeable Feat combination of blues and funk. The writing is equally divided, with each member being represented in the songwriting department. Previous efforts from Little Feat were dominated heavily by producer/lead guitar/vocalist/-fat kid extraordinare Lowell George. Most of the lyrics are amusingly written and deal with everything from Hollywood Scenes to the mysterious woman, from Jurses to romancin' and dancin' the horizontal mambo.

I can't really pick out any favorite tunes, I like them all quite a bit. I can say that my speakers boogie to "Down Below the Borderline", with its hooking riff, bass, drums, and rhythm guitar doing some fine syncopating. Also includes the line, "Onomatopoetry symmetry in motion, they heard about the girl clear across the ocean." "Day or Night" features fine synthesizer and keyboards, as well as some very tasty licks and chops from drummer Ritchie Hayward. Hayward is one of the finest drummers around today, right up there with Jimmy Gordon and Keith Moon. Not so much that they play similiarly, but that all three drummers have a fine sense of style---You can pick them out on a record right away. "All That You Dream" features fine vocal work, evenly divided between rhythm player Paul Barrere (hold accent grave according to personal taste) and Keyboard player Bill Payne, who is also a much in demand session man.

There is of course unbelieveable bass work by Ken Gradney, and laid back conga and percussion from Sam Clayton. "Somebody's Leaving" is a haunting tune by Bill Payne, who is also the writer of "Pleasin' Each Other" on the new Bonnie Raitt album. Lowell George does excellent work throughout, can't really say enough about that boy---He sings so soulfully, and matches it equally with his lead guitar work, how can any group contain so much talent? There are so many subtleties to the music of Little Feat that I could write a couple more pages---I won't, and instead recommend (quite highly, I must add) all you loyal readers to check out THE LAST RECORD ALBUM. And, as Lowell puts it "the real name of this record is the first record album so let no paranoia ensue." Above all, this is a group with each member's personal style meshing perfectly to form an even more unique combination. Listen to Little Feat---They will not fail you now.

Photogarden Open To Photobugs

by Sari Bodi

The rapidly growing number of professional and amateur photographers are discovering the art of picture-taking. Bob Gibeau opened Photogarden in Burlington three weeks ago as a place for these photographers to display and discuss their work.

As a gallery, Photogarden features a different Vermont photographer every three weeks. Gibeau said that the photographs need not be professional, previously published or necessarily for sale. "If we think they're good, we exhibit them."

Beginning Saturday, will be an exhibit titled "Rejects." Some cast-offs from Fleming Museum will be displayed. As 460 prints fit this category, the title can be misleading.

Two other functions of Photogarden, as a shop for selling photographic equipment and a center for aspiring photographers to exchange ideas, combine the art aspect of photography with the technical. "Photo shops sell you materials," said Gibeau, "and it's up to you to do something with them. My idea for Photogarden is to provide a place for photographers to show their works and discuss new projects." Gibeau has been a photographer for 16 years. "I know a lot about the technical end of photography, including tricks and special devices, and I keep up with new ideas. I like to talk to people and help them with problems they may be having or give them new directions to test."

One corner of Photogarden has stacks of Gibeau's collection of old magazines and books for people to leaf through, and a slide projector and screen where they can view their slides and discuss them with Gibeau or other photographers.

Gibeau will be selling specialized equipment that photographers may not be able to purchase elsewhere, as well as standard materials. Large format cameras, which have recently become popular, are part of his stock of specialties. "These cameras, which are excellent for detail and color for doing everything from girls and scenery to architectural and medical photos, used to be used primarily for advertising," said Gibeau. "If you ever noticed the Coke advertisements with the clearly detailed droplets of moisture at the mouth of the Coke bottle; these pictures were shot with the large format camera.

A large format camera is on display in a glass case with Gibeau's 1932 press camera. He said that he may have an exhibition of old cameras.

When questioned about the idea of displaying some of his own photos, Gibeau replied that his wife thought that this wouldn't be right, but that eventually he would like to. Photogarden is located at South Winooski Ave., where the organic food's store used to be. All camera bugs are welcome and may find a center for the exchange of ideas in this field.

Photogarden presents "Reject," a sample showing of the rejected photographs from Vermont Photography '75, judged by Nathan Lyons. This show starts Saturday, November 8 through Friday the 29th at 115 S. Winooski. It is open 9 til 5:30 daily and on Fridays till 9.

From Whores to Lou Gehrig

by Jose Santana

Burlington—Each semester the theatre department presents a festival of one act plays directed by students in the department's directing class. This year's festival will feature five comedies and a social drama.

Leroy Jones's The Toilet is directed by Lyle Ferguson. "The Toilet," Ferguson said, "is a good black play with good black roots to it; the kind of play which is a necessity for me to direct, being black on a predominantly white campus." He feels it's been too long since such a play has been presented, here at UVM. Not since Dutchman in fact, another Leroy Jones play, in which Ferguson played the leading role, two years ago.

The Absurdist play, A Resounding Tinkle, is directed by Kevin Maconi. "Tinkle," Maconi said, "is a play that pokes fun at many of our institutions as well as human behavior in general. Its interesting characters personify a lot of quirks that exist in all of us." He chose the play because he said it is a very funny one act comedy.

Peter DeLorenzo will direct Tom Stoppard's After Magritte. According to DeLorenzo, Stoppard was so impressed by an art exhibit of the renowned artist Rene Magritte that he decided to write a play along the same lines as Magritte's paintings. Thus, the name, After Magritte. "Magritte the painter is noted for putting every-day objects in extraordinary circumstances. He blows things out of proportion; sticks things where they don't belong," said DeLorenzo, and added "Stoppard is a genius and a crazy man; he fascinates me."

"I wanted to direct a funny play with an undercut, a depth, beneath the surface comedy," said Karen Trott, director of The Day the Whores Came Out to Play Tennis. For her, Whores stood out among the many other one acts she read, including some of Wilder's and Albee's. Whores was written by Christopher Fry. "Whores is an actor's play," said Trott, "each character in it is well defined and well developed."

Jason Miller's Lou Gehrig Did Not Die of Cancer is directed by Paul Ugalde. "It's not so much a what-happens play, but rather, the character relationships in it that will make it work." Ugalde, this year's president of the University Players, chose this play because he liked the dialogue as well as Miller's handling of a potentially soap opera type plot. "The play," said Ugalde, "has its serious moments. The audience should be left with something to think about." Jason Miller, author of Pulitzer Prize winning play That Championship Season also appeared as young Father Karris in the Exorcist and performed here at the Champlain Shakespeare Festival's '64 season.

Unfortunately, Dan Cournoyer, director of Doing a Good One for the Red Man was not available for comment.

During the semester these students have studied important directors, their concepts, ideas, and the practical application of those ideas. The class also worked on an original manuscript of Andrew Mack's The Spices of Life. Each student had to do a complete dramatic analysis of and stage a scene from Mack's play, using class members. The class meets for one hour five days a week.

Professor Edward Feidner, who teaches the course, feels the one act festival is one of the most exciting moments of the season.

Performance dates for The Toilet and Doing a Good One for The Red Man are December 5 and 6. A Resounding Tinkle and After Magritte will be presented on December 9 and 10. Lou Gehrig Did Not Die of Cancer and The Day the Whores Came Out to Play Tennis will close up the festival on December 13 and 14

Tom Akstens to Perform

by Carrie Webbley

On November 14 at 8 p.m. the Billings Roundhouse will present an evening of free entertainment spotlighting the newcomer hopeful, Tom Akstens. Although Akstens has been playing music part-time for twelve years, beginning as a high school student in Boston, he just recently left a career of teaching literature and folklore in order to concentrate on his music. He has played in bluegrass bands, blues bands and as a guitarist, but since the early part of this year he has been pursuing his work as a solo performer. He has played in Massachusetts, Philadephia and upstate New York; other colleges which he has visited include Rutgers, Clarkson and Vassar. He has also played at coffeehouses like Towne Crier, Connecticut Folk Arts Center and Fair Harbor. The musicians with whom he has shared billing include Cris Smither, Jay Ungar and Lyn Hardy, and Neil Rossi.

Musicians who have had a lasting influence on his music are Mississippi John Hurt, Wade Ward, The New Lost City Ramblers, Bob Siggins, Tex Logan and Happy and Artie Traum. Akstens performs his own original arrangements of country blues and traditional music utilizing clawhammer banjo, fiddle and guitar. He feels that many of the older traditional songs are as profound and meaningful today as are the new works. His goal is to play both well for appreciatvie listeners. Don't miss your chance to relax and appreciate what promises to be a worthwhile musical experience!

George Sand, 'The Notorious Woman'

The story of George Sand, the notorious novelist who sparked controversy from the day she was born, will be told when "Notorious Woman", a seven-part Masterpiece Theatre series begins on Vermont ETV, Sunday, November 16, 9:00 p.m.

Rosemary Harris plays George Sand, the cigar-smoking, trouser-clad author who was the personification of women's lib in her time (1804-76). The first woman to talk and write about sex realistically and honestly, she abondoned her husband and children and took a succession of lovers insisting that "My body is mine to give and I shall give it to whom I wish." Among her lovers was Chopin.

The famous — composers, writers, actors, musicians, and politicians — flocked to the salon of George Sand, where conversation often focused on questions of women's rights. Sand's passionate interest in that subject was highly personal. At 17, she had been a great heiress, mistress of a splendid house in Paris and her family's Nohant estate in Berry. When she married, under French law she was simultaneously stripped of her huge fortune and left without a franc of her own.

So she finally fled to Paris, to "live a free life," took Jules Sandeau as a lover and also took the first syllable of his last name as her own (she had been born Amandine Aurore Lucile Dupin). Her early attempts at writing failed miserably, and she became suicidal and very difficult to live with.

But, determined to succeed as a writer, she almost worked herself into a mental and physical breakdown. At times she thought seriously of entering a convent. Then "Indiana," a novel she wrote under the pseudonym of George Sand, suddenly brought her fame, and she began to make a great deal of money.

She became influential in liberal political circles, championing the emancipation of women from the double standard that confined them. Although her opinions attracted almost universal disapproval, she lived exactly as she wished, ignoring convention and becoming "the most scandalous woman in Paris."

She died at Nohant on June 8, 1876, at 71. "Her life had many phases," wrote author Henry James in his Paris letter to the New York Tribune, "but the longest was that of her old age, which was very tranquil and reasonable; so much so as to efface the memory of others which had preceded it. She had always been a singular mixture of quietude and turbulence."

In addition to Rosemary Harris, whose acting talents get full rein portraying this "singular mixture," the cast of the Masterpiece Theatre mini-series being presented by WGBH, Boston, includes George Chakiris, Cathleen Nesbitt, Joyce Redmond, Sinead Cusack and Alan Howard.

The BBC—Warner Television co-production was produced by Pieter Rogers and directed by Waris Hussein. The seven scripts in the Mobil-funded PBS series were written by Harry Junkin, co-creator and chief writer for "The Saint" and many major early US TV dramatic programs.

TRAVEL TIPS TO MEXICO

With vacation time fast approaching, many of you will no doubt be traveling to Mexico. Some of you might even be coming back. Here are some helpful hints.

1. A man on a burro always has the right of way, unless he appears to be a weakling.
2. In local cantinas, pouring a shot of Cuervo down a man's collar is not thought to be humorous.
3. Falling onto a cactus, even an actual Cuervo cactus, can be a sticky proposition.
4. It is tough to find hamburger rolls in the smaller towns; it's best to bring your own.

Pre-registration Woes? Visit the ARC

As deadlines for course registration loom closer, most students panic and worry about scheduling courses for the spring semester. There seems to be no end to the sink-or-swim decisions for which course, which major. But survival is possible: Why not stop in at the ARC – Advising Referral Center, 337 Waterman.

The ARC (notice the bright orange posters on bulletin boards?) opened October 13th. You are encouraged to walk right in, between 9 a.m. and 5:30 p.m. Or call and talk to Jane Patterson, "the staff," at extension 4174.

Once you find the ARC, the question of immediate interest is how the ARC can help those "drowning in academic problems." Its purpose is outlined in the idea that students need to be advised of alternatives and then referred to the right place.

Advise – wise, the ARC was initially started to improve on the existing academic/advising system. Unfortunately, many students (and faculty) heretofore have practiced advisor/avoidance techniques, on the premise that advisors are too busy, so enrollment forms should be quickly signed rather than discussed. Jane mentioned that several students had come by to ask, "How many courses do I have to fail before I flunk out?" At the ARC a student can try to locate an advisor if he has none, or if he has one, find out how to better communicate with him or her or change advisors altogether. Or the student can come to ARC to talk out the more complex student problems of course selection, information, or tutorial first-aid. As Jane observed, "There is plenty of room for frustration – and a feeling of alienation in a University of this size, especially when mid-term grades are returned... As for ultimately choosing majors, there are more than 130 different possibilities here. Understandably, there are many viable majors and academic alternatives that simply remain unknown to students due to lack of available information."

Consequently, the right referral is a crucial factor at the Advising Center. Previously, there had been no particular access-oriented place which had at its fingertips such vital cross-references between academic and campus alternatives. But it should be noted that the ARC, however helpful, is primarily a referral center and cannot take the place of an advisor. Its mission is to get students in touch with faculty and vice versa.

For the bewildered and even for the semi-bewildered or curious, Jane Patterson's room, with its plants and soft sitting places, is anything but Watermannish. Aside from being geographically the center of Waterman (behind the Information Office), the ARC is part of the Arts and Sciences effort to strengthen the advising system for both students and faculty. Jane is currently working on a faculty advising handbook. "The function of this office," she says, "is to serve as a bridge between faculty and students. Although it is set up mainly to serve students, obviously faculty are deeply involved..."

The ARC also provides a direct line between students and the academic administrators behind the glass doors. The feeling is that faculty, too, can benefit from the wealth of information the ARC has to offer. But isn't that flow of information supposed to be the basic business a college goes about dispensing? This information, or apparent lack of information, leads to the origins of the ARC.

In response to concern about advising and quality of instruction, many departments are undergoing a sort of Renaissance of Advising. One such offshoot of this activity is the ARC. The concept grew from a report of the Committee on Academic Advisement, appointed last year by Vice President Rollins. Professor Joseph Izzo (Mathematics) headed the committee and gathered information, suggestions, and critiques which culminated in a number of recommendations, one of which advocated establishing an advising/referral center.

The ARC lady, Jane Patterson, has charted the waters of UVM for 10 years – four of which fell to undergraduate majoring in Sociology. The remaining 6 years were spent here in graduate work, coordinating a student advisory program in the College of Education and Social Services, and serving with student activities as a graduate assistant. Immediately prior to her present position, she was Assistant Director of Admissions along with Richard Steele. She's traded at just about every academic/activity part the University has to offer.

This University has an abundant supply of academic and human-potential resources, and the purpose of the ARC is to help student and faculty find out what they are. So save time, face, and money – make the best of what UVM has to offer – visit the ARC!

The Way Concert

"The Way", a group formed in 1971 in Costa Mesa, California will be in concert on November 12 at the Flynn Theatre in downtown Burlington at 8 p.m. Perhaps no greater contribution has been made in contemporary music in the last year than that by a group known as "The Way." Their long anticipated second album, "Can It Be?" produced by Al Perkins, famed steel guitarist, formerly with Mannassas, the SHF Band, and now with Mason Proffit, is getting good airplay as well as great reviews.

Comprised of five proven musicians, The Way are joining together in response to the need they all feel to share their faith in their own unique expression.

Past concert tours have included appearances at UCLA, Georgetown University, William and Mary, North Carolina U., U of Houston, just to name a few. The Way has appeared at the famed amusement park, Knott's Berry Farm in So. California before a record attendance crowd of 20,000.

Also, appearing in concert with The Way is Bill Yantz, formerly of Vergennes, Vt., and former lead singer in the Vistas a few years back. This will be Bill Yantz's first concert appearance in recent years.

It should prove to be an unforgettable evening with the debut of a progressive West Coast group here in Burlington and with the return of Bill Yantz.

Tickets are on sale at Bailey's Music on Church St. in downtown Burlington, the UVM Bookstore as well as the Flynn Theatre box office. This is another Rock Enterprises Production.

Looking For Louise...

The guys in the tank didn't care. One guy thought it was pretty funny. Actually I did too, except I sort of thought someone else had really done it. The whole thing only took an hour, and now I was ready to go to sleep.

I got one phone call. It took a lot of thought. Ingrid wouldn't come bail me out. Jeddy had no phone and no dough. Mike would talk all night about preparing my defense. I called Chirooeki.

"Hank, I'm in the tank. I tried to run through a tanker with a little motor boat. It didn't work. I'm tired."

"A tanker, on the lake?"

"Yup."

"I thought you were working tonight."

"I was. This was after work. I was restless so I went walking. Then something happened."

"O.K. kid. I'll come spring you. I've been there myself. But never for trying to ride a motorboat through a hunk of metal."

"Thanks Hank. Thanks a lot."

The sergeant told Hank I was an unstable character, and not fit to be employed. I agreed secretly, but didn't say anything. When we walked out together, the goddamn sun was coming up. I went to Jeddyboy's and closed my eyes.

His identification with them remained, and although they are now divorced, Bob is considerate and thoughtful of each of them, and sees them frequently. Trustees

This week the Board of Trustees of the University of Vermont will decide whether VPIRG should continue to be funded under "the present system. At present, students are billed $3.00 per semester but may waive payment of the fee at the initial time of billing or may obtain a refund. Students have voted by a margin of 9:1 in favor of the present funding. Also a number of prominent public figures have expressed their support of VPIRG. A number of these comments are printed below.

Vermont's Governor Thomas Salmon: "I believe that VPIRG's presence on the Vermont scene has been both forceful and productive."

Lt. Governor Brian Burns: "They (VPIRG) have done tireless work on behalf of Vermonters. The method of funding at the University is the only practical way that I can see for many of these young people to participate in State Government in a real manner. The present check-off feature is an important part of the funding for the organization. After the vote of the students it would appear to border on irresponsibility for the Trustees to negate their action."

(CPS) -- There's more to one kind of inflation college administrators complaining about. Galloping inflation has drawn criticism of administrators through the country who, beginning to question many students deserve the grades they get.

As evidence, they point to Scholastic Aptitude Test (SAT) scores for college-bound seniors which are falling to lows at the same time grade point averages are climbing.

Trustees To Vote on VPIRG

This week the Board of Trustees of the University of Vermont will decide whether VPIRG should continue to be funded under the present system. At present, students are billed $3.00 per semester but may waive payment of the fee at the initial time of billing, or may obtain a refund. Students have voted by a margin of 9:1 in favor of the present funding. Also a number of prominent public figures have expressed their support of VPIRG. A number of their comments are printed below:

Lt. Governor Brian Burns: "They (VPIRG) have done tireless work on behalf of Vermonters. The method of funding at the University is the only practical way that I can see for many of these young people to participate in State Government in a real manner. The present check-off feature is an important part of the funding for the organization. After the vote of the students, it would appear to border on irresponsibility for the Trustees to negate their action."

U.S. Senator Robert Stafford: "The strength of VPIRG is that it is funded and controlled by students. In my view VPIRG has served as a constructive vehicle for young people who are concerned about our society, and that it has demonstrated the potential of making a significant contribution to that society."

U.S. Rep. James Jeffords: "I feel strongly that VPIRG has been a useful and positive group. When our campuses were in turmoil in the Sixties, we said 'work within the system.' VPIRG is doing this and with success."

"I would expect that VPIRG would find it very difficult to continue in its present form were this (the present funding system) to be discontinued. I hope that those who oppose some of VPIRG's positions will not try to silence it by the discontinuance of funding."

U.S. Senator Patrick Leahy: "I would like to confirm my support of the Vermont Public Interest Research Group. As you know, I was one of the first officials in this state to support VPIRG in its early pre-incorporation days."

Consumer Fraud Dividion Chief, Assistant Attorney General, John Easton: "I feel that the student referendum should determine the funding system. It would be indeed unfortunate if the funding mechanism is used to weaken the viability of VPIRG.

I feel that it is essential to have a strong consumer advocacy organization in this State and I think VPIRG fulfills its responsibility in this regard. VPIRG is valuable to the Vermont consumers and should not be emasculated by those who may disagree with its philosophy."

Have Your Cake and Walk It Too

by Daniel B. Haslam

A spokesman for the representative body of fraternities and sororities on the University of Vermont campus said in an interview last Thursday that one of the most important goals of his organization is to restore a controversial and now-defunct student activity, Kakewalk, to the university community.

David Lott, communications director for the Greek Coordinating Council, listed as a "number one" priority of the goals of the council "to try to bring Kakewalk back." Kakewalk, an ethnically-related dancing competition which was set to music and hailed as the nation's oldest collegiate winter carnival, was ousted as a university-sanctioned activity in 1969 after several years of charges of 'racism' by campus liberals and black students. Since 1969 the Greek-letter fraternities on campus have discussed reinstating Kakewalk, much to the distress and anger of the liberal Student Association and minority groups on the Burlington campus.

Lott would not speculate as to when the Greek council might try to bring Kakewalk back on campus and refused to comment on whether or not it could return as early as next semester. He said that the Greek council would be working for "an improvement in Winter Week" this year but did not mention if Kakewalk was what the council had in mind.

He said that he felt the mood on campus for a return of Kakewalk was "getting there" and that a number of downtown merchants had expressed an interest in seeing the competition revived. The Kakewalk weekend at the university brought back thousands of alumni and parents to Burlington and was considered to be one of the major factors in the strength of the Greek fraternity system, which annually rivaled for the coveted Kakewalk, skit, and snow sculpture trophies the festival offered.

Lott commented that the last of the UVM students who were undergraduates at the time Kakewalk was phased out, had graduated in 1973 and that the furor of revitalizing it had seemingly died with that graduating class. He indicated that the approach of the Greek council might be low-key towards reviving the tradition; to provide a demonstration of the event and hopefully negate some of the racial overtones it was said to have.

One problem which Lott acknowledged concerning the reinstatement of Kakewalk is the present status of the fraternities. "The spirit is missing," he said. "No one in the (fraternity) house understands the spirit." It is an ironic but logical problem Lott pointed out, that when the class of '73 graduated, the techniques, as well as the resentment about how Kakewalk was danced, left with them. Even with alumni help, which Lott says has been generously offered for a return of Kakewalk, learning the dancesteps regaining Kakewalk's momentum will be difficult. "You have to relearn by doing," he said.

Only Half the Story on Grade Inflation

(CPS) — There's more than one kind of inflation that college administrators are complaining about. Grade inflation has drawn the criticism of administrators through the country who are beginning to question how many students deserve the grades they get.

As evidence, they point to Scholastic Aptitude Test (SAT) scores for college-bound seniors which are falling to new lows at the same time that grade point averages are climbing.

At the University of Oklahoma, where the average grade in one college is a 3.0, Dean Paige Mulhollen said recently that people hiring graduates "are going to begin to wonder, if everybody we turn out has a high grade point but some of them aren't very capable. They're going to start asking us, 'Wait a minute, what are you doing for us?'"

The dean of the school of education at Arizona State University was alarmed enough by the high grades doled out in the school to put a ceiling on the number of A's or B's awarded each quarter.

More than 85% of the school's students received A's or B's in fall quarter last year, according to a survey. Final grades won't be able to exceed a 3.0 average for all undergraduate students under the new system.

The problem is hardly confined to Arizona and Oklahoma. A study of 197 institutions conducted by a researcher at Michigan State University showed that since 1960, the average grade earned had risen by about one half of a grade.

As a result, according to the dean's student assistant at Johns Hopkins University, "It is increasingly difficult to distinguish mediocre students from the truly outstanding ones." The assistant claimed that if the trend is unchecked, grades will no longer be a valid measurement of achievement and "the mainstay of the educational system will in fact be perverted."

Administrators doubt that grades are going up because students are getting smarter. They point to SAT scores which show that, if anything, the opposite is true.

SAT scores released this fall showed that on an 800-point scale, the average verbal score throughout the country who are has dropped 44 points since 1963. Scores on the math section of the tests have dipped 30 points over the same period.

The SAT's are a "standardized measure of developed reasoning abilities important in college courses," according to their designers.

In Oklahoma, Mulhollen said that there are a number of reasons why grades have edged upward over the years.

"Some think it has grown out of the Vietnam war, that there are some faculty who were unwilling to give bad grades that might lead to people getting drafted," he said.

He added that there are others "who think secondary education is better than it has ever been before, or that television has created a 'super-generation.' There are a lot of suggested reasons but I don't think anybody has much data to support any of them," he said.

Other administrators blame the economy. The need to keep enrollment up during hard economic times may have led instructors to give higher grades to keep students at their schools.

At the University of Wisconsin in Milwaukee, administrators claimed that policies allowing students to drop classes they are doing poorly in may be part of the reason for grade averages that have risen from 2.6 to 2.8 there between 1969 and 1975.

The result of skyrocketing grades, according to Yale Dean Jaroslav Pelikan, is that the "nuances about a student's capacity for scholarship are more and more difficult to read from a transcript." Both employers and enrollment officials will be forced to rely less heavily on grade points and develop other methods to measure ability.

News Analysis:

New York Faces Bankruptcy

by John McDonald

President Ford "has painted himself into a corner" over the impending bankruptcy of New York City. So far he has remained consistent in his stand that he will veto any measure which gives pre-default assistance to New York before the actual declaration of bankruptcy. Having made a political issue of New York's wasteful habits, Ford will have a difficult time in accepting legislation that gives power to delay the "day of reckoning" which he thinks is so justly needed.

In saying that he will veto any pre-default bailout of New York, he has forced Congress to look for alternative plans. For example, Ford himself favors an "orderly" bankruptcy under a federal court's control. This plan would allow the court to sell debt certificates to raise operating cash after default. As nice as this may sound, the problem is not so simple. There is an overwhelming degree of doubt as to whether investors would buy these certificates which would have first call on any city revenue but which wouldn't be 'federally guaranteed.

But regardless of whether or not investors would buy these debt certificates, New York would still need federal help in borrowing money to avoid "draconian" budget cuts that would have "chaotic" effects. For example, from the Joint Economic Committee's lengthy analysis of New York's financial plight it has been reasoned that if the city went bankrupt under federal court protection but without any federal borrowing assistance, massive cuts in spending would be needed to balance expenses with incoming revenues. The necessary cuts, averaging $305 million dollars per month for the first four months after a default on Dec. 1, would bring about extensive layoffs, missed payrolls and withheld public assistance checks.

Consequently, a default-with-aid plan has been considered by the Joint Economic Committee. This plan would also involve a court supervised bankruptcy procedure but included would be federal action to allow the city to borrow money to cover its impending operating expenses. A federal loan guarantee would enable New York to avoid serious cutbacks which may tend to prolong and bring about more post-default problems and complications.

A third possible course of action would be to prevent default completely. According to the JEC though, this would be an "inequitable" procedure because it would pay off present bondholders while city residents and employees experience the detrimental effects of massive budget cutbacks.

As stated by the JEC, "clearly the central issue that Congress must examine is whether to provide a source of credit before or after default."

With the ever likely possibility of default coming closer and closer one can not help but consider the economic consequences of default. As observed in the JEC report, the consequences would be serious but not catastrophic. Aside from the potential political and social upheaval, it is believed that no major bank is likely to topple but generally banks would become more cautious in lending and demand higher interest rates. Demanding higher interest rates would, of course, inhibit borrowing which could both hurt and slow down the economic recovery. Default may also cause state and local governments to curb spending. This would also act to slow down economic activity.

Vice-President Rockefeller doesn't say whether he supports federal aid to New York or not but stated recently that a default could lead to a "catastrophe" and could very well impede the nation's economic recovery.

Hugh Carey, governor of New York is calling for federal support to guarantee payment on New York City's notes and bonds. Claiming that the city "isn't seeking a pardon for past errors or a bailout," Gov. Carey believes that a federal bond payment guarantee would give the city time "to pay its debts and reform its practices." Without federal assistance, Mr. Carey asserts that New York City is just "a few steps away from bankruptcy."

My best to you and New York in your decision, Mr. Ford.

TM ...Cure For Stress And Strain

by Kim Hagen

Have no fear, the secret is here! You can now enjoy your life more fully, and eliminate all traces of tension by merely paying $125.00 ($65.00 if you're a student). This is the price of inner peace. Transcendental Meditation (TM) can remove all the stresses of modern hectic life.

These are the claims of the advocates of TM, led by Maharishi Mahesh Yogi who brought this secret from the Himalayas. This Maheshi Mahem Yogi believes that all of today's crises will be solved on one important condition: that at least one percent of the world's population participates in Transcendental Meditation.

Several books have been written on the subject of TM. Some of them are quite good, providing evidence of the positive effects of this meditation technique. The major problem with them is that most were written by members of TM, who tend to show only the positive side of Transcendental Meditation, thus actually distorting the picture. They claim that TM is not a religion nor a philosophy, but merely a technique for lessening our stress. Ironically, TM evolved from the mystical Advaita school of yoga and has a Hindu devotional as an initiation ritual.

It is also claimed that using this technique lowers the blood-lactate levels indicating reduced tension. Long ago, this interpretation was proven faulty; it does not indicate reduced tension. Last of all, TM'ers claim no other meditation technique does what TM does. Considering scientific studies and other successful meditation techniques, many fail to recognize a significant difference between techniques. All are just as effective as TM in lessening stress, and some are free. After all, who can place the price on inner peace?

Everyone wants inner peace and any "secret" that holds the answer is priceless and should be given freely.

UVM Ranks 100th In Federal Aid

UVM ranks 100th in total receipt of Federal aid. In 1973-74, the Federal Government spent $4.4 billion dollars subsidizing colleges and universities. Although many state universities receive more dollars than UVM, many private institutions also receive more. For example, MIT received 69.5 million dollars plus $86 million dollars going to Draper Laboratories, an independant research institute associated with MIT.

The highest ranking school is the University of Washington with $81.89 million. Other New England state universities rank lower than UVM with the exception of BU ranking 47th at $23.1 million, U.Mass ranking 85th at $14.25 million, and U.Conn ranking 80th at $15.5 million dollars.

Other schools receive the following from the government: University of Wisconsin at Madison, $73.6 million; University of California at San Diego, $71.1 million; University of Minnesota, $68.06 million; Howard University, $67.02 million; Stanford University, $66.78 million; University of Michigan, $63.87 million.

Other New England Colleges are: Yale, $55.5 million;

Burlington's Urban Renewal May Undermine Image

by Mary D. Partridge

Burlington — "Most surrounding states are envious of Vermont," says Mayor Gordon Paquette. "I think Burlington has the image of being a progressive city."

Progress in Burlington these days has taken the form of urban renewal. The downtown parking garage is expected to be completed by Christmas. The mayor hopes the lakefront hotel, with 200 rooms, will be finished in time for next summer's Olympic Games in Montreal. "We're going to be loaded around here during the Olympics," he said. "We'll have people sleeping on the Chandeliers."

Although many people believe that Burlington's economy is based on industry, Paquette said that the city is "a retail center which depends a great deal on tourists." Burlington "can't afford to be industrial city," he said. "It costs too much to bring raw materials in."

If federal revenue sharing, a program which redistributes federal tax money to state and local governments, doesn't get passed by Congress, Burlington will face a $600,000 deficit. In preparation for this, Paquette has set a hold on the hiring and promoting of civil employees in Burlington.

The urban renewal program is being financed by a private developer. "We are looking for funding for the civic center now," said Paquette.

The civic center, a $14 million project which will attract visitors to Burlington, will "never carry its own load," Paquetto said. "It will receive an annual city subsidy of $60,000."

Situated near the lake, the civic center will hopefully "kick off the cleaning up of the lakefront," said Paquette. "The civic center, especially the performing arts center, will be for Vermonters. The convention hall is primarily for out-of-staters."

What makes Vermont the envy of surrounding states? It is the relative simplicity of life in a small state and the beauty of the land which attracts most people to Vermont. Burlington's "progressive" urban development may undermine these attractions.

Phi Beta Kappa

by Daniel Haslam

The Phi Beta Kappa Society of the University of Vermont, the local affiliate of the nation's oldest and most prestigious academic honor society, will meet later this month to elect a tiny percentage of upperclassmen into its membership.

Dr. Virginia P. Clark, a member of the English faculty and former secretary for Phi Beta Kappa, said recently that the forthcoming elections will be part of the ongoing induction process of the Vermont chapter. She said that less than ten percent of the 1976 graduating class will be elected to Phi Beta Kappa, an honor which is considered in academic circles to be the highest recognition a student can receive.

Clark said that elections for the honor society take place three times per year and consider students who have completed six or more semesters of undergraduate work. She outlined the evaluation process as assigning a 3.4 cumulative average (on a 4 point scale) as a cut-off point for consideration. A cumulative average is the sum total of grades a student has received divided by the number of courses taken to compute academic standing.

Clark said that the selection

Blood Donors Needed

by Debbie Maranville

Do you remember the enormous blood drawings at Billings? Remember standing in line for three hours? Such is a thing of the past!

The Red Cross Blood Center is now scheduling dorms to come to 23 Mansfield Avenue on various days.

Where is 23 Mansfield Avenue? It is located across the street from OVP and Housing, and is closer to main campus than most of the dorms are.

There are many good reasons for asking UVM people to donate at the blood center:

1.) It saves time. At the mini-drawings, only 45 minutes to an hour is involved in the entire process.

2.) It allows the blood to be taken to the laboratory immediately. When this is done, blood may be divided into various components. Your donation of a single unit of blood may be used to treat as many as four patients.

3.) It fills the blood needs on a ongoing basis. If we spread the 800 units usually collected at Billings more evenly over the semester, we can help meet the various needs more completely.

Support the blood program! It's a very special life-giving gift that only you can give. If your dorm has already been scheduled, or you can't donate with your dorm, please call 864-4541 for an appointment. This week's schedule:

Along with the advent of our present day sexual freedom has come the problem of how to control pregnancy and population. All of you, male or female have probably experienced by now the problems encountered when one is not "protected". The element of risk arises and poses some potential perils.

The Pill has added greatly to sexual freedom and is still the most popular way to prevent pregnancy. According to Planned Parenthood reports last year, approximately 80 of new women patients chose oral contraception despite the potential medical complications involved. For example, the Federal Food and Drug Administration recently stated that "birth control pills increase the risk of heart attack and that women over 35 should use other forms of contraception." This warning appeared in the FDA July-August drug bulletin.

Despite the problems of the Pill, it is still widely used according to Roslyn Kenworthy, a counselor with Co University Health services "Pill users have dropped about 70% to 65% over past three years."

Regardless of contraceptive prio according to the Popul council, "among a grou one million women who d use any contracep 600,000 would be pregnant and 150 would related complications. A other groups of the same 150,000 condom or diaph users would become pre and 38 would die; 3 women using IUDs become pregnant and 19 die; and 20,000 women Pill would become pr and 35 would die, all b from pill complications."

These figures at first very high but are est figures based on a pop

Cohabitation Still An Issue

by Cynthia Crosen

(CPS) — University rules against men and women spending the night under the same roof have relaxed somewhat in recent months, but outright cohabitation is still against most official policy.

More campus dorms have been converting to coed living, visitation hours on many campuses run all day every day and some local officials won't enforce anticohabitation laws unless other complaints are involved. But most University administrators still maintain an official stance against cohabitation and local officials will occasionally enforce the city laws.

Earlier this month, U. University of Montana students learned that local zoning law prohibited cohabitation. The city of Missoula's building inspector said he doesn't have the time to check every house in the University area for "zoning" violations but would evict tenants for cohabitation if other complaints were involved.

Students living in an apartment complex at the Rochester Institute of Technology (RIT) in New York have also tangled with University and local officials over cohabitation policies. In cases where there have been other problems between student tenants and the university landlord, cohabitation has been cause for eviction.

"We do not condone or allow cohabitation," RIT's director of Business Services said. But "if I just happen to know we have a situation possibly violating the lease but there aren't any other problems such as dogs or cats it is practically impossible for us to police who is living in apartments," he added.

At other schools, coed living, if not cohabitation, is making advances. A university apartment building in Oregon is now officially coed, a first for the University of Oregon. Changes there were easier than in other university housing since the building was originally designed as an apartment house with separate bathrooms and living rooms.

At some schools, like Stanford University, the dorms are coed by floor or corridor and have been very popular with students for several years. One student claimed that Stanford's dorms had optional coed rooms, but University housing officials claimed it was not authorized by them. "Things like that do occur but it's not University policy," a spokesman said. "But coed situations aren't usually associated with a lot of problems."

Coed dorms at the State University of New York (SUNY) at Geneseo have worked out so well that students camp overnight in front of the housing office to reserve a room in one. The dorms there are coed by floor or suite and there is a 24-hour visitation policy for everyone but the coed-by-suite dorms.

"We do not condone or allow cohabitation"

For these close quarters the university requires an 8-hour break in visitation hours every night.

The reasons for the policy, as the SUNY/Geneseo president explained, are that there is no way to enforce cohabitation restrictions with 24-hour visitation and that everyone should have the right to study without the boy or girlfriend of the roommate around.

The irony, according to one Resident Advisor there, is that no one bothers to enforce the no-cohabitation rule anyway.

Students at the University of South Carolina were told they could integrate one of their women's dorms without any request or agreement from the women who live in it. In fact, many of the women were "shocked" at the proposal. The president of the dorm claimed that the plan was "too liberal for many of the girls in the dorm."

committee will look for students who have demonstrated a superior interest in language and literature and have stressed a challenging course of study in their college work.

"We tend to think quite narrowly of the student who has limited his other coursework to one or two areas," Dr. Clark said, "and avoided courses of a more difficult nature," referring to students who satisfy only the minimum requirements of their field of specialization.

Clark said that when possible, "high moral character" of the student is sought after, in addition to the academic criteria the selection committee uses. She commented that morality in life is one of three ideals of the society, which also stresses friendship among peers and love of literature (knowledge). Faculty chairpersons are invited to submit names of candidates to the society, Clark noted, and said that it is always helpful for someone on the committee to have interviewed the candidate personally.

Questioned about the present status of the society on campus, Dr. Clark admitted that Phi Beta Kappa had maintained a low profile on college campuses during the late '60s and early '70s, but said she felt the "anti-elitist attitude" of that period was over.

"Honor societies may be coming back for all the wrong reasons," Clark suggested. "Undoubtedly, having Phi Beta Kappa on your record can help," she said, but that the spirit of the award may be lost in the rivalry of larger numbers of students competing for recognition.

Dr. Clark said she has noted a more serious attitude by students in their work than was present five years ago, and that she feels this has helped to change the sentiment towards honor societies on campus.

Phi Beta Kappa society was founded in 1776 at the College of William and Mary in Virginia as the nation's first Greek-letter fraternity. The Vermont branch, known as the Alpha Chapter, was one of the first 25 societies to be chartered and was the first chapter to admit women, in 1875.

United Way Funds Many Organizations; Promotes Social Progress

CHITTENDEN COUNTY CHAPTER AMERICAN RED CROSS

One day recently, two ladies were driving home from an afternoon of shopping at one of the local shopping centers when the driver suddenly complained of feeling ill and stopped the car. She slumped over the wheel, lost consciousness, and stopped breathing. Her companion quickly stretched her out on the seat and administered mouth-to-mouth resuscitation until the victim began breathing again. The driver of the car behind them summoned an ambulance. Later, doctors said that the victim's life had been saved by the promptly administered first aid.

Each day, there are hundreds of stories like this, as people trained in first aid use their training to sustain the life of someone who has been injured in an accident or has suddenly become seriously ill.

The Red Cross first aid training program is far from static. The course content is updated, adapted, and changed to include new problems and to take advantage of the newest in educational methods.

The techniques taught by the Red Cross are not only accepted as established standards by business, industry, labor, many government agencies, but are required by the Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970, and approved by the medical profession.

America's accident rate is alarming. The Red Cross strives to reduce it. For many years the Red Cross has urged that everyone be trained in first aid. As the population grows, so does the need for safety training. Only one student works at the Red Cross from UVM. More volunteers are needed. Please help us help!

RETIRED SENIOR VOLUNTEER PROGRAM

One of the best illustrations of interagency cooperation is the Retired Senior Volunteer Program's Men's Workshop, a workshop setting for men with severe physical handicaps. The project was designed by RSVP under a mini-graat provided jointly by the Merchants Bank and by the Federal ACTION Agency. The specialized outreach worker assigned from the RSVP office found that there were a number of seriously handicapped men in the community who had little or no opportunity to get together with other men and to take part in traditionally masculine-type activities. They were plentifully supplied with friendly visitors, with visiting nurses, and with other social services agency needs, but most of the personnel with whom they came in contact were female. It is important that the men have the feeling that the skills and talents which they had accumulated over the years are still needed and that they have a useful role in helping non-profit agencies and community groups to carry on their functions.

RSVP decided to plan a type of "sheltered workshop" to bring the men together to repair items for groups and to do volunteer work with the Burlington Boy's Club to use their excellent woodshop machines and facilities. The Visiting Nurses Association agreed to provide male aides to give physical assistance to the men and to help with undertaking the volunteer projects. The Howard Mental Health Service agreed to provide transportation in their van, which had been donated by the Rotary Club. RSVP provided staff assistance and recruited the men who had been referred by a variety of community agencies. Thirteen men having multiple limiting conditions now come together twice a month in the workshops. They have repaired sleds for the Baird Children's Center, and repaired toys and equipment for the Head Start Program. The men have made a quilting loom for the Birchwood Nursing home, and are making hand looms for residents of a nursing home. They have constructed and painted window boxes for the Visiting Nurses Association and are now soliciting other projects from other community agencies.

All of these things take place because of the flexibility and willingness to cooperate, and a desire to help one another.

INTERFAITH SENIOR CENTER

As Mr. Brown began to be a regular recipient of the Federal Nutrition Program the staff at the Interfaith Senior Center observed that he had a medical problem becoming worse each day. He had a story to cover any questions about his unusual facial appearance. These stories did not seem logical. After a few weeks, we felt that we know him well enough to make inquiries. During several ensuing conversations, we were able to convince him to seek medical assistance. Examination revealed that Mr. Brown had cancer of the nose. At this writing he is ready for his final stage of plastic surgery. His medical problem is behind him.

During the months that we have gotten to know him, we have made available to him several programs which have helped his low income situation. He now gets food stamps to help him stretch his food dollar and receives medicaid, which has paid for all of his medical bills.

Mr. Brown now volunteers in the community through Chittenden County RSVP, comes to the Center each day for a hot noon meal and to participate in the many programs offered. He has a new outlook on life with many of his physical and financial problems solved. This improvement in the quality of life for our older people is the main objective of the Interfaith Senior Center.

VERMONT CATHOLIC CHARITIES

An illustration of the counseling services offered by Vermont Catholic Charities to area families is portrayed by the situation in which a young man came to the agency at the suggestion of a local information and referral service which he had first phoned for help. He saw a growing distance between himself and his wife. Also, he noticed the additional strain that this tension had upon the overall emotional tone in the home, and especially regarding the children, their behavior and school work.

The husband, a well-educated man with a good job, had been working extremely hard at his career with the aim of bettering his family. Tensions and misunderstandings mounted because the husband devoted long hours to his work. This led to strain, more quarreling, periods of silence and unresolved disagreements. This gradually harrowing situation pervaded the entire household and slowly involved the children. Arguments over handling the youngsters only aggravated the matter.

At this point, the man decided to visit Catholic Charities to talk with someone concerning the extremely threatening situation of his life, love, family, and home. The relief which the Catholic Charities provided enabled him to encourage his wife to come in also. It was decided that the husband and wife each be seen by different counselors. This included joint counseling sessions as a foursome in an effort to work toward the goal of concretizing the marriage relationship. The couple then would be better able to cope with day-to-day living and reach a richer sense of fulfillment in the marriage.

Gradually, they saw their respective parts in the conflict and gained a better understanding of the other partner's feelings and apprehensions. Improved communication helped them to see the effects their own stress was having upon the children and the resultant strain the youngsters' upsetness was having on the entire family picture. As a result of the willingness and desire of this couple to seek marriage counseling at a critical point in their lives and in the lives of their children, they were able to reverse a worsening situation involving family relationships. Their joint efforts also prevented the possible break-up of their marriage and home, and allowed the re-establishment of a healthy, happy, secure atmosphere for the children.

THE VERMONT CHILDREN'S AID SOCIETY, INC.

Melinda came through the door of our office after her boyfriend was arrested for stealing a car. Her mother and new step-father were very concerned, because it was not the first time that she had been involved in "trouble." At 14, Melinda was superficially self-assured and cocky. She was "having a good time, doing what she wanted to do." She wondered why anybody should care anyway -- she hadn't hurt anybody.

True, she had not hurt anybody, but Melinda herself was hurting badly. Her father had committed suicide two years earlier, and her mother had suffered a nervous breakdown and had to be hospitalized for six months following her father's death. Melinda had lived with her grandmother, and according to the grandmother, "had shown no effects from the tragedies." When her mother did return, Melinda had to assume many adult responsibilities. She had started going out with some older kids, feeling that she was more adult than her own age group, and began to drink and smoke marijuana. When Melinda first saw the worker, everything was fine. As she began to trust the worker, she began to show her unhappy side. Finally, after many talks, Melinda shared with the worker her notion that her father had killed himself because she had been a bad girl. By working with the mother and Melinda, the worker helped Melinda come to terms with her feelings about her father, mother, and stepfather.

We were reminded of Melinda because we received a note from her the other day. She had written her worker to tell her that her mother and stepfather had just celebrated their tenth wedding anniversary, and she had been reminded of the agency. She herself had now been married for two years. Enclosed with the letter was a picture of her 11-month-old baby boy.

During the early part of 1974, we said a "technical goodbye" to one of our children when he celebrated his 18th birthday.

We first met Bob when he was 10 years old. His mother and father were two very unhappy, emotionally sick people whose marriage was deteriorating. They were having many difficulties with Bob and his two young sisters. The situation had reached a crisis, and all three children had to be removed from their home legally. The Vermont Department of Social Welfare became legal guardian of the three children, and requested our agency to take responsibility for the overall planning for the children's futures. The Department of Social Welfare paid board and clothing expenses.

All three children remained in the same foster family over the years. Several caseworkers were involved, but the children learned that Vermont Children's Aid Society was the stable parent figure, consistently there through the separation from parents, the difficulties of adjustment to a new way of life, the joys and hazards of being teenagers.

Bob spent many hours with his caseworkers. Over the years he learned to trust us and to trust himself, and slowly he grew into the responsible person he now is. The intensive casework therapy he received form our staff, and the help of foster parents, teachers, and people in the community, all contributed together towards his becoming a reliable hardworking young man. Since

Schools and agencies in the Burlington area offer opportunities for students to learn by doing and a chance to move out of the classroom.

The Elizabeth Lund Home is an agency in Burlington designed to care for unmarried mothers, their babies, and non-pregnant girls who have more than the usual difficulty at school or in family life. It is a place that provides a neutral setting for a girl who has a number of decisions to make without people telling her what to do. This atmosphere gives a person some time to really look at herself and see where she's headed, what goals she has for herself and for her child.

For a pregnant girl, the decision to place her child for adoption or to keep it is not an easy one. Alternatives are presented and the pros and cons considered by the girl and the father of the child, if he is involved by the girl, and with the girl's caseworker. But the final decision is the girl's. Counseling and recreational activities are an everyday happening with trips to Stowe and Huntington Gorge, Halloween festivities, and donated Lane Series tickets for girls who have never been to a play or the ballet before.

Medical services are supervised by UVM's College of Medicine. Ob-Gyn residents and medical students come to the Home once a week to provide the vital prenatal care. Classes are held weekly by the Visiting Nurses Association which explain pregnancy, labor, delivery, and contraception. Instruction is also offered in child care and development for mothers planning to keep their babies.

The average woman served by ELH in '74-'75 was about 17 and a Vermonter. About 50% of the women placed their child for adoption. In 1970 the average age was 19.5 and almost two-thirds placed their child for adoption. With the awareness and use of contraception, the Lund Home's older clientele seems to have given way to a much younger population. Ranging in age from 13-18, these girls are considered "high-risk" pregnancies because of their youth. With the availability of abortions now, it is a wonder to many that these particular women have chosen not to have one. But there are many reasons why the option to terminate pregnancy is not opted. The religious affiliation of some steers them away from this alternative. In other cases, pregnancy is detected too late in term so that abortion cannot be performed. Others are under eighteen and their parents have refused to grant permission and sign the necessary papers for the abortion.

With this in mind, the Lund Home provides another option for a pregnant woman. For a woman who has decided to go through pregnancy, often it is important that she have a place away from the demeaning eyes of classmates or family. It is not always a happy place, however. It's tough to watch a 16-year old set up an apartment with a 3-week old baby.

Being able to work in an agency such as ELH has given me a chance to have contact with all types of people and to have new experiences, such as labor and delivery, group living, of handling crisis-situations at 3:00 a.m.

The need for ELH is real.

What Goes In: The Cholesterol Question

by Cindy Thaell and Ginny Bickles
U/L Nutrition Program

Egg substitutes, low cholesterol margarine, and soy protein sausages have bombarded the market. Coupled with an effective advertising campaign, cholesterol has been proclaimed the "heart villain." Eggs, butter, bacon, lard, cream and beef are doomed. What is fact and what is fiction behind the cholesterol question?

Cholesterol is not an evil substance that has recently crept into our lives. In fact, cholesterol is normally manufactured by the body. Its chemical structure is classified as a sterol, which is a ring-shaped alcohol found in fats. Cholesterol is a basic ingredient in the body's manufacture of bile acids for fat digestion, in the sex hormones, hormones of the adrenal cortex which respond to stress, and in the manufacture of vitamin D from sunshine. It also is essential for transport of essential fatty acids, is a constituent of the skin and covering of nerve fibers, and is found in gallstones. Research indicates that every mammalian tissue is capable of at least some degree of cholesterol synthesis although it is made primarily in the liver.

Three factors appear to control the synthesis of cholesterol in the body: 1) the amount of cholesterol in the diet 2) the total calories in the diet, and 3) a normally functioning circulation of bile acids through the liver and intestines. Bile acids and bile are important emulsifying agents in the digestion of some dietary fats. If the diet is rich in cholesterol, the body will synthesize less. If the diet contains an excess of calories, more cholesterol is produced. In fact, the liver can synthesize as much as 2 grams of cholesterol from excess dietary fat, protein, and carbohydrates which is considerably more than the 0.5 gram intake in a balanced diet. The synthesis, absorption, and destruction of cholesterol in the mammal is controlled by a complicated feedback mechanism(s) in which bile acids and cholesterol are the principal characters. If bile and bile acids are drained out of the body by a tube in a duct from the liver and thus diverted from the intestine (their normal destination), the manufacture of bile by the liver is tripled and intestinal synthesis of cholesterol is increased 10 fold. It is almost impossible to regulate the blood level of cholesterol merely by altering the diet as the body has its own regulatory mechanisms and controls.

How is cholesterol involved with heart attacks? It is recognized that people with high levels of cholesterol in their blood do have more atherosclerosis and risk heart attacks. Atherosclerosis is the condition of "hardening of the arteries," a slow accumulation of fatty material along the walls of an artery. The artery can become entirely blocked and the blood supply to the tissue is cut off. If this occurs in the heart, a coronary or heart attack occurs, in the brain, it is a stroke or cerebral vascular accident. The slow accumulation of material is caused by a number of factors, one of which is the level of cholesterol in the blood. It is found that rabbits that are fed a diet high in saturated fat will increase their blood cholesterol level three fold in 2 or 3 months and their arteries will be extensively corroded. The process in man is estimated to take 20 years.

Is high cholesterol the villain? It is now thought to be a symptom but not the cause itself. An important factor in blood cholesterol is a condition known as familial hypercholesterolemia. One person in a million has inherited two genes for this disease and will have 6 times more cholesterol in their blood than is normal. These individuals usually die of a heart attack before age 20. But one person in 500 carries one gene for this condition and will have a blood cholesterol level 2-3 times that of a normal individual. He/she will often have a heart attack around age 40.

Cholesterol is often lumped together with other substances, primarily triglycerides called serum lipids. Cholesterol is the easiest to measure and is often considered a good indicator of the other substances. An abnormal increase in these substances is called primary hyperlipidemia (a condition of high fat in the blood). All of us show secondary hyperlipidemia after eating a meal high in fat but a person with a primary condition has too much fat in the blood even after overnight fasting. Presently, Drs. Donald Frederickson and Robert Levy of the National Heart and Lung Institute are implicating high blood triglycerides as well as high blood cholesterol in heart disease. Triglycerides are fat molecules. They are not soluble in the blood and normally hook-up with certain blood proteins such that they become soluble and can be utilized. If for some reason the body does not manufacture these proteins, the triglycerides will float around in the blood. Drs. Frederickson and Levy have identified 5 blood-fat abnormalities which are genetic and which can be modified with special diets and medication. They urge regular testing for blood triglyceride as well as blood cholesterol level as early as 3 or 4 years of age.

JOSEPHINE B. BAIRD CHILDREN'S CENTER

Case no.1: Jim was ten years old when he was admitted to the Children's Center. Although he was not a bad looking boy, his surly expression made him seem unattractive. His behavior was described as "hyperactive, destructive, impulsive, and easily detracted." Jim had no family of his own. The foster home where he had been living had given up on him. Treatment had been attempted in the community. Most of his school work was on the first or second-grade level and psychological testing placed him in the borderline range.

The carefully structured program of the Center gradually changed Jim's behavior and even his appearance. When he learned to trust the staff and share with them some of his feelings, he appeared more open and friendly. In spite of his poor reading skills, Jim had a good vocabulary and was very imaginative and creative. He composed songs and stories. After one year at the Center, he was transferred to the Children's Center Group Home, where he continued to improve in many areas. He became more self-confident and had better self-control.

Because he had no family, Jim was available for adoption. After much effort by the adoption agency, Jim was placed out-of-state. The last report was "Jim has adjusted well and is doing better in school. His new parents enjoy taking him to ball games and look forward to the fishing season. He is very happy and cheerful."

Case no.2: John came to the Children's Center from his own home when he was eight years old. He was large for his age, rather clumsy, shy and infantile. He clung to adults like a much younger child. At home he had been destructive, fought with the other children and ran away. He was not progressing in school. He had a hard time taking care of himself and had to be helped to dress and bathe himself. After a year at the Children's Center, he moved to the Group Home and the following year was assigned to the Day treatment Unit. The Day Treatment Program is partially funded by United Way.

John learned to take responsibility for himself, ride the bus, use the telephone, and do some other things which he had not been able to do. His school work improved and he began to catch up with his peers. The program also worked with John's family. John's mother became involved in a local community project which was a very rewarding experience. The father was handicapped and unemployed, but Vocational Rehabilitation trained him for work he could do on his own. By the time John went home, his father had his own business and was a positive influence in the home.

The latest report was that John is in high school now and recently made the football team.

United Way Campaign

United Community Services needs a work-study student for human services planning and evaluation programs. This person must meet financial assistance requirements. Please direct any inquiries to the UVM Financial Aid Office.

The first organized UVM United Way campaign is being run on campus Wednesday, November 12th, in all the dining halls during the day, in Billings for off-campus students, and in the Bookstore by the sororities. Because the student is a part of Burlington and may receive the benefits of United Way Agencies, it's important to include him or her in the annual drive. An example of a benefit is the Red Cross – if you need blood, the Red Cross won't shut its doors because you're a student. We're entitled to the same benefits the rest of Burlington receives – we live here. Many student volunteers work in agencies supported by the United Way – the agencies need us, and we need the agencies.

The organization consists of six area coordinators: Anne Swift – Waterman and Simpson Dining area; Pam Bryant – MAT; Jim Donlan – Harris-Millis; Cathy Leach – Wright; Henry Lewis – Living/Learning; and Liz Leopold – Given Cafeteria. These area coordinators, along with Randy Lash, the publicity director, are working under the direction of Lady Holmes, the chairwoman of the UVM United Way campaign drive. These area leaders will appreciate your support. If you have any ideas for the campaign and wish to volunteer an hour of your time on November 12th, sticking pins on contributors, collecting money, or just telling people about the United Way, contact one of these leaders. Our goal is $1,000.00; it may not seem like much, but last year only $232.00 was collected on our campus. With your help we hope to realize our goal.

What the local United Way Campaign is to the student as a citizen of Burlington:

It is you. The Chittenden County United Way Campaign funds the Chittenden County United Community services. There are 27 agencies included in United Community Services. The agencies touch nearly every person in the County and across all class, economic, political and social lines. The Services are simply people helping people. You helping others and helping yourself. The government has nothing to do with the campaign, and the reason why there is one campaign instead of 27 is efficiency – one campaign, one drive, one gift.

The money then is divided up according to need – some agencies are larger than others and serve more people. No agency receives all the money it wants. It's simply impossible to fulfill the needs of all the agencies. Thus, those who can demonstrate a community

by Mary Jane Nattress

I work at BYASC. What's that? It's the Burlington Youth After School Center for kids from 6–12 years of age.

Where, you ask? The YMCA runs this program for Burlington school children from 3 p.m. to 5 p.m., five days a week.

What do we do? You name it, we'll try it! We have a regular program of events for each afternoon: cooking, a quiet room, the game room, and use of the pool and gym at specified times. We also have access to the YMCA's van for field trips.

What do I do? I enjoy working in the gym and the pool. Seeing those kids burn up some of that stored energy and trying to keep up with them – well, you come try it!

They count on the staff to be there, and each activity a counselor participates in only makes him or her more human. By participation, it's not only physical, but more verbal. Providing understanding, encouragement and lots of TLC are an essential part of each day.

BYASC – It's a special kid, a favorite activity, a feeling – to each of us it's personal and, moreover, special.

Emergency Alcohol Service

Seven UVM students are currently involved in working at EASE (The Emergency Alcohol Service), an alcohol and drug detoxification center. They work as volunteers or as academic interns who get credit for their work.

Tom DiCampo, a psychology student, states, "It's a chance to get out of the classroom and into the real world, as well as a chance for experiential learning." Tom works two 8-hour shifts per week.

Paula Bagalio and Jill Flanagan, nursing students, spend one day each week at EASE. "Seeing a community treatment program in action is a good experience. Encountering people's reactions to alcoholics is an education in itself."

Volunteer Hans Puck says, "For me, it's a beginning of a transition from business into the helping profession. It feels good to work with people who are not interested in money alone."

Debbie Suran is a senior in her final semester as a Social Welfare major, and is doing her practicum at EASE. "I think it's great that the Social Welfare program provides an opportunity for learning in the community. It's important for me to test my abilities in my chosen field before I commit myself to a graduate program."

Psychology student Debby Hill spends two days each week at EASE. "I'm glad to be out of the classroom, because when you have to apply what you've learned in class to a work situation, it's a whole new ballgame."

Fred Matthews, volunteer, says, "It's an exciting experience working with people at EASE. I enjoy the personal touch of the service we offer."

The Salesians...
Helping others to help themselves.

True charity isn't always a handful of rice . . . or the gift of a warm shirt . . . it's helping others to help themselves. A more lasting and dignified way, we say.

Since our foundation in 1859, this has been the Salesian way. Education is the keynote. What good is a meal today when one must think of all the tomorrows? St. John Bosco knew this well. What good are dreams unless they are translated in reality by deeds?

Around the world, Salesian missioners help their flock by giving them ways to help themselves. Whether it is agricultural training or technical training for a trade they can learn, people are encouraged to find their own niche, their own way of betterment, their own road to human dignity and self help.

Salesians work primarily for youth, for it is in the young that hope is born. There are Salesian missions in 73 countries around the world. If you are interested in a life that gives as much as it receives, fill-in the coupon below . . . and we will send you additional information on the Salesian way.

What Goes In-Cholesterol Question?

fluctuate with age, diet, and also stress. It is important to have several tests performed on different days in order to have a reasonably accurate level. The recommended level for men and women over 40 is 210 milligrams cholesterol per 100 milliliters of blood. This can fluctuate from 150-300 and still be considered within a normal range. Individuals under 40 should have an average recommended level somewhat less than 210. Drs. Levy and Frederickson suggest a triglyceride level less than 160 mg per 100 ml.

How does all this jargon affect tonight's dinner of steak and potatoes with sour cream and tomorrow's breakfast of bacon and eggs? There is little evidence to prove a high cholesterol diet will lead to high blood cholesterol. The African Masai tribesmen live largely on milk and eggs yet their cholesterol level is low. This is often attributed to their athletic nature. Research indicates the greater the physical fitness, the lower the cholesterol level. Tinkering with the diet can often lead to disaster as was found in the late '50's. Cholesterol was entirely removed from infant formulas and it was found these individuals were unable to tolerate dietary cholesterol in later life. The egg has been maligned as an evil food yet is so complete a nutrient that it can support the life of a developing chick for 21 days. It now seems evident that an overall high calorie diet, rich in sugars, starches, and fats but not necessarily cholesterol, may be a major cause of high blood cholesterol.

Our genetic background, our smoking habits, our weight, our proneness to diabetes and high blood pressure, and our serum lipid levels can spell heart disease risk, but none alone are the one and only cause. Your physician most likely can determine your genetic conditions, blood pressure, diabetic nature, and your cholesterol and triglyceride levels. You can alter your smoking and exercise habits, eat a balanced diet, and once again care about your body – now. Twenty years is not so far away!

'The Machine Stops' American Prophecy Fulfilled?

by Appleton King

E.M. Forster once wrote a story entitled The Machine Stops in which he described an earth where everyone existed underground in his own little cell depending, entirely upon an omniscient machine which supplied him with all his essentials quite mechanically.

The inhabitants rarely left their rooms or their motorized chairs because they had merely to press buttons to summon the voices and features of their friends. Human contact was shunned and bodies deteriorated from lack of exercise.

The most peculiar thing about Forester's story was the sheep-like, shallow nature of the people, who, it is suggested, evolved into this advanced state and left the surface of earth as something to be abhorred and studied from a lofty, introspective vantage point.

The quality of life in this mechanized society is a theme which has not been ignored by writers such as Huxley and Vonnegut.. Brave New World and Player Piano have both spoken out against the tyranny of an advanced industrial state which alienates its people. But the fact that The Machine Stops was written in 1909 is most shocking. It reveals that the author had excellent foresight. He tried to convey an urgency he felt to his readers about a lifestyle which was self-destructive. Unfortunately, this life-style may have become something of a reality.

One has merely to wander the streets of a large city to observe the fear and distrust people feel toward each other. We are catered to by instant fast-food restaurants and whisked homeward and untouched by other humans by our music-insulated automobiles. Americans are plagued with obesity due to sugar-infested foods and a lack of stimulus from physical exercise. The Machine, in an overall view, is composed of the dominent institutions of our society which have a large effect on the goods and services that we will consume and on the distribution of wealth. In daily living, a smaller scale, the Machine is composed of details such as work assignments which prevent any kind of self-expression or creativity and lead to dull and uninspired life-styles.

If we are not literally underground men, then Forster would certainly say that we have in a figurative sense, fulfilled his prophecies to a large extent. At the turn of the century, he said a good deal about the increasing ability of man to alienate himself instead of forcing himself outside to experience the real pain and joy found in the world of direct perception. Television is obviously an excellent barrier to the ideal, which is direct experience. TV is a machine in its own right, hypnotizing mechanism which renders its viewers non-participatory victims of propaganda and banality.

Our nation may be deemed progressive in that it has invented and introduced many exciting and innovative products in the last century and a half. But it is clearly reversing this so-called progress by polluting the land and the people – something that may or may not be avoidable due to the population increase. Progress is not only concerned with new products and ideas but with their sane, reasonable use to benefit the general public. Maybe at age 200 the U.S. should take a good, hard look at progress and a short story written in 1909.

QUESTION: For many years I have heard the term "beer belly." Is there really any relationship between drinking beer and a large stomach?

ANSWER: There is no evidence that drinking beer specifically causes an individual to develop a protuberant abdomen. More likely, the protuberant abdomen may be associated with, first, an excess intake of calories (including the calories in beer).

Secondly, the so-called beer belly probably results from loss of normal muscle tone of the abdominal muscles, due to a lack of physical activity.

Thus, if at some time past age 35 or 40 one assumes a lifestyle that is all too common for present-day society, which includes too many calories, too many beers and too little exercise, a beer belly may result – and, unfortunately, probably also a "beer heart," if we could see a heart to give it such a name.

QUESTION: I have heard it said that if one takes birth control pills, she should periodically stop taking them. Is this correct? Also, is there any danger in trying to get pregnant the month after stopping the pill?

ANSWER: Many physicians recommend that their patients stop taking birth control pills for a few cycles out of every two or three years. This is done to periodically allow re-establishment of normal ovulation. During this time, of course, some other method of contraception must be used if one wishes to avoid pregnancy.

However, there are many individuals who have started and continued on the pill for several years with no interruption in taking them and with no apparent side effects to date. Thus, it is apparent that all the information is not in on this particular problem with birth control pills and is an area that will need continued observation.

There is no known contraindication to attempting to get pregnant during the cycle immediately following discontinuance of birth control pills. The egg released during that cycle is, as far as we know, a perfectly normal egg. I know of no study which suggests anything to the contrary.

QUESTION: How soon following a missed period can you be sure you are pregnant?

ANSWER: Pregnancy is, contrary to popular belief, not necessarily an easy diagnosis to make. It has been suggested by physicians more competent in the area of obstetrics than I, that the only way one can be absolutely certain of pregnancy is to hear a fetal heartbeat, to see a fetal skeleton on x-ray or to deliver a baby.

This is probably not as far fetched as might initially appear. There is a condition known as pseudocyesis (which, roughly, translates as "false pregnancy"), in which many of the signs of pregnancy are present when conception has not actually occurred. With this condition, positive pregnancy tests have been reported at times.

Secondly, there are certain tumors of the uterus which can secrete the so-called pregnancy hormone which give a false positive pregnancy test and with the patient developing many clinical signs of pregnancy, including an enlarging uterus, breast changes, morning sickness and such.

Thus, for pregnancy to be properly diagnosed at an early stage requires (1) a compatible medical history, (2) a physical examination which is compatible with a pregnancy and (3) a positive pregnancy test.

The pregnancy test is simply a chemical test of a woman's urine to determine if the urine contains the so-called pregnancy hormone – UCG, urinary chorionic gondadotrophic hormone. Depending on the kind of test actually used, this hormone can be detected in the urine and, therefore, give a positive pregnancy test as soon as a few days after the first missed period.

However, at this early stage, there are many false negative tests and it is probably wisest to wait until approximately four weeks after the first missed period – or at the time the second period is missed – to get the highest percentage of positive pregnancy tests, if, in fact, one is pregnant. Even with prognancy, upon occasion we do see false negative tests in a very few percentage of cases when an individual is definitely pregnant.

Vermont Booters Thrash Purple Knights

The University of Vermont Soccer team released all its frustrations from the 1-0 loss to Maine the weekend before, and thrashed St. Michael's 8-1 in Winooski.

After the exasperating loss to the Black Bears, the UVM kickers let loose 43 shots on goal and seven tallies in the last half to decimate the Purple Knights in the regular season final.

The Catamounts totally dominated play throughout, and without the spectacular goaltending of St. Mike's Kit O'Brien, the booters might have reached double figures.

John Koerner got things going for Vermont just 36 seconds into the game. Koerner's goal came when he headed a perfect pass from Gerry Daly into the right corner of the net.

It was Koerner's day as he had two goals and an assist. The sophomore ends the regular season with 14 goals and 22 points to lead both the Yankee Conference and New England. The eight assists and 14 goals are both school records for a season. Koerner also owns the lifetime mark of 12 assists, breaking Jack Semler's record of 11.

Midway through the first period, the Knights pulled even on a goal by Tom Quinlan. The rest of the half saw UVM unable to strike again, due mainly to superior goaltending by O'Brien.

The Cats blew the game wide open with three goals in the first four minutes of the second half and seven in the final period. Gil Low scored back-to-back goals only 1:25 apart and Mark Heinrich dipped one past O'Brien to give Vermont a 4-1 lead.

Carl Christensen took an indirect kick from the top of the goal area and when the shot was blocked by St. Mike's will, he picked up the rebound and slammed the ball past the screened out O'Brien.

Bruce Norton connected at the 16:45 mark to make it 6-1, and then Rick Whidden and John Koerner pulled off a pretty two-on-one play. Koerner slid the ball to Whidden when the Knight's defender committed himself and Whidden scored easily to make it 7-1.

Koerner scored Vermont's final goal following an indirect kick at the 33:30 mark.

The Cats played without co-captain Bob Cleverdon, but freshman Dave Verrier did a fine job filling in. Once again, it was a total team effort that was the reason behind the Vermont win. It was rightly so then, that this year's edition finished the season with a record 11 wins and a record winning percentage (11-2).

The eight goals also broke the school record for goals in a game and the 39 goals for the season falls one shy of another record.

The Cats are all but assured of a playoff spot in the New England Division I Soccer Tournament which will be announced November 12. As it stands right now, UVM will face top ranked Brown University at Providence sometime prior to November 19th.

Baby Cats Win

The UVM B soccer team completed its season last Wednesday by defeating a determined Middlebury squad 3-1. Middlebury opened the scoring midway through the first half. UVM got its first score in the first half on a shot by Doug Powell. The Cats got untracked in the second half when Craig Hawkins scored to make it 2-1. Mark Dawhan ended the scoring for the Cats when he collided with the goalie and the ball deflected into the goal. The Cats came up with a solid defensive effort from fullbacks David Heilner, Gregg Bowering and Bob Davis. Goalie Rob Woods, a questionable starter after suffering a concussion in his last game, turned in a fine performance turning away repeated scoring threats by Middlebury.

The Baby Cats finished their season with a 7-0-1 mark. Of those seven wins six were shutouts. All in all, it was a highly successful season for UVM soccer.

Yugoslavia Basketball

One of Yugoslavia's oldest sports organizations, the LOKOMOTIVA basketball club of Zagreb, is sending its team to the United States in late November to celebrate the 25th year of its existence.

For the past decade the US, Russia, Cuba and the Slavs have been the Big Four in World's basketball for men with the latter country second to the Americans in the 1968 Olympics, and also runner-up in last year's world championships in Puerto Rico. The Yugoslav hero of the late 1960's was Dragan Kovacic, a Lokomotiva player, who dropped in the decisive points in the Slavs' 63-62 victory over the Soviets in the Olympic semifinals at Mexico City. The Americans, in turn, defeated the Slavs, 65-50, for the gold medal.

The tour, the first ever to the United States by Lokomotiva, is being arranged by Sam Ketchman of Sarasota, Fla, president of Athletic Enterprises. He has coordinated various basketball invasions of the US, the most recent being the all-winning, 20-game schedule of the Australian girls team last spring.

Current star of the Lokomotive team is Nikola Plecas, captain of his country's squad at the Munich Olympics. He has played in 210 games as a member of the Slav all-national team and also has been named to the All-European roster four times.

Other Lokomotiva stars who also are teammates of Plecas on the Slav national squad are Andrija Knego, center; Ivan Gospodnetic, forward; and Damir Rukavina, guard.

Next to soccer, basketball is the most popular sport in Yugoslavia. This is primarily true among the younger athletes of high school age. The graduates continue their participation in clubs of which Lokomotiva, with more than 200 members and its own court facilities, is one of the most successful and prestigious.

Yugoslavia came into being in 1918 after World War I when six countries which never had been united before, became the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes formally but generally was known popularly as the Balkan Slavs. Germany forced the young country into World War II as an ally and when the Slavs rebelled the Nazis invaded the country and whipped its army in two weeks.

Josip Broz Tito became the hero of the rebellion and since then has been president of the socialistic republic.

The presence of six different countries under one flag has led to intense sports rivalry and accounts, in part, for Lokomotiva's huge number of international games. Zagreb, with a population approaching 800,000, is its country's second largest city.

Volleyball Enjoys 2-0 Win

by Kimberly Honza

Having only held one practice together as a team, optomistic coach Cathy Schiller and her young team faced a strong Castleton State team last Thursday and won decidely, 2-0.

Having just recently completed a successful soccer season, Coach Schiller was enthusiastic about her prospects for this year's volleyball squad. "We've got freshman and sophomore talent that just crawled out of the woodwork," stated the coach. "This team gelled the first time they played together."

Surely, UVM lived up to expectations. Leading early, the team was ahead 7-2 at the end of the sixth service. Castleton, however, rebounded on some good service by Laurie Chatey, and after the seventh service the score was tied 7-7. The score remained close for the rest of the game, and with less than four minutes of play remaining, UVM lost ground, and the score favored Castleton, 11-10. The game winning point came on a very nice play set up by Jay Cahow and put over by Alice Lajoie. The final score of the first set was UVM 14, Castleton 12.

In the second set, the team had familiarized themselves with one another's techniques, and continued on to stun Castleton, 15-0. Excellent service by Connie Angulo as well as outstanding performances both offensively and defensively by Belinda Emerson, Mary Shakespeare and Alison Morse, made for a well-played game.

The B-team fared just as well, defeating their Castleton Opponents, 2-0. In the first set, UVM won, 15-11. In the second set, UVM won easily with Diane Vaudrells' service and some good positional play making by Chesley Wallace, 15-9.

Swimmers Take Third

by Kimberly Honza

A young and relatively inexperienced UVM women's swim team travelled to Plattsburgh, N.Y., Halloween evening for the Plattsburgh Invitational. UVM made a good showing, placing third behind a strong McGill team and only 29 points behind the host Plattsburgh team. Finishing well behind UVM were Middlebury, Vanier, and Skidmore respectively.

Coach Sandra Farrell was pleased with the team's performance, stating that they all looked strong, and did a good job skill wise.

Laura Schreisheim was the principle point maker for UVM. Miss Schreisheim took firsts in the 100 yard individual medley, with a time of 1:10.0, the 100 yard backstroke, and the 50 yard breaststroke. She also placed second in the 100 yard breaststroke.

There were also strong performances by such individuals as sophomore Lynn Clark, second in the 50 yard backstroke (33.4) and also a place finisher in the 100 yard backstroke. Andrea Kalisch took a second place in the 500 yard freestyle with a 6:22.0, and teammate Paula Yankowkis placed not far behind. Lone diver Kathy Kurz made a consistent performance, managing to place her dives well.

UVM is looking forward to a tough schedule this year, competing with such powers as UMass, Dartmouth and U Maine. Their first home meet will be the UVM Invitational on November 15.

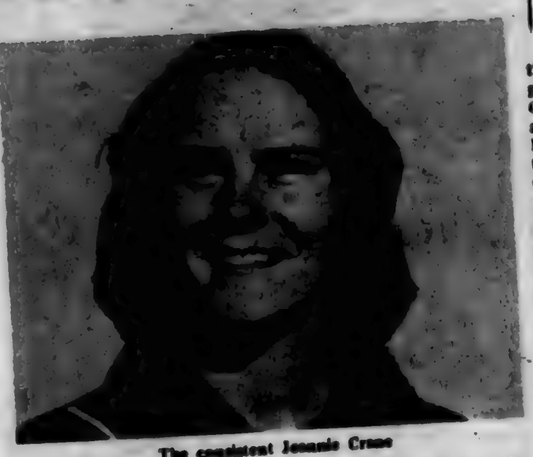
Degan, Crane Qualify For Cross-Country Nationals

Carol Degan – An Undefeated Season

Carol Degan and Jeanne Crane recently qualified for the First National Cross Country Championships, to be held November 15, at Iowa State University in Ames, Iowa.

Carol Degan, a junior from Mahluis, NY, who completed the season undefeated, and Jeanne Crane, a senior from Quelph, Ontario, will be flying out of Montreal on November 14, and arriving in Ames, Iowa, to meet with top competitors from the nation's colleges. Both women have been consistent point getters for the UVM effort this year, usually finishing first and second.

In order to attend the National Championship, the women had to make a qualifying time of less than 13 minutes for a 2-mile course. The pair ran exceptionally well during trials, although the course was muddy due to the recent rain. Carol Degan completed the 2-mile course in 11:34, and Jeanne Crane followed with a 12:02.



The consistent Jeannie Crane

Basketball Pre-season

Basketball practices continue daily at UVM in preparation for the opening game, Nov. 29, against Northeastern at the Roy L. Patrick Gymnasium, but before the Huskies visit Burlington, head coach Peter Salzberg has scheduled two away-from-home intra-squad games and a pre-season tilt with RPI. The two intra-squad games will be held at Barre's Auditorium, Nov. 6, at 7:30 p.m. with proceeds going to support the Spaulding High School Athletic Program and at Rutland High School, Nov. 18, also at 7:30 p.m. Proceeds from that game will also support the high school's athletic program. On Nov. 13, the Vermont cagers will face RPI at Bellows Falls High School in a 7:30 p.m. pre-season game sponsored by the Bellows Falls Rotary Club. Tickets for all three games may be purchased in advance at the respective high schools.

Also, before the Northeastern regular season home opener, Salzberg's cagers will host the rugged Yugoslavian team, Lokomotiva, the top team in Yugoslavia. The tour, the first to the United States by Lokomotiva, will feature one of the top players in Europe, Nikola Plecas, captain of his country's team at the Munich Olympics. Announcement on how to purchase tickets for the game, Nov. 23, will come from the UVM Athletic Department at future date.

Hockey Pre-season

Vermont hockey fans will have a chance to see the 1975-76 edition of the UVM hockey team in Rutland and Burlington before the season officially begins with a two-game set at St. Louis, Nov 21 and 23. Jim Cross will bring his hockey team, led by All-American Tim O'Connell, to the new Rutland Indoor Hockey facility, Nov. 14 for an intra-squad game beginning at 6:30 p.m. Tickets for this game are available at several outlets in Rutland. Rutland attorney, Chris Webber, Jr., is the coordinator of the game. Proceeds from the game will go to the Rutland rink. New bleachers are expected to be ready for the Nov. 14 scrimmage.

Following the Nov. 14 intra-squad game in Rutland, the Vermont hockey Catamounts will have their first crack at new faces, as they host McGill University in a pre-season game, Nov. 16, at the Gutterson Fieldhouse. The game, sponsored by the Friends of UVM Hockey, will begin at 1:30 p.m. Tickets, available at the Patrick Gym, Room 206, are $2.00 for adults and $1.00 for students.

The Middlebury-Vermont hockey game, originally scheduled for Jan. 15 at Middlebury, has been changed to Jan. 14, it was announced by Middlebury officials.

Women's Sports Roundup

by Kimberly Honza

UVM women's athletics enjoyed a busy schedule this past week, with many sports participating in tournament play, while others were opening their season.

On November 1 and 2, the women's field hockey team traveled to Kingsport, RI to URI for the New England Regional Field Hockey Tournament. The Catamounts made a good showing, coming away with a 2-1 record in tournament play. On Saturday the team played two games, the first being against URI, which they won 3-1 on goals by Ellen Cooke, Lisa Fernandez, and Mary Eddy. UVM also took the second game 6-0 over Fitchburg State College. The six individuals scoring in that game were: Lisa Fernandez, Ellen Cooke, Anne Margolis, Pam Packard, Gene Fagins, and Sharon Farquharson. Sunday's action saw UVM dropping an extremely close game to Keene State College 2-0. Tied 0-0 with only 2 minutes of play remaining, Keene State was able to drive in two hard goals. Of the 17 teams participating in the tournament, 2 all-college teams were picked that will travel to the North East Tournament on November 15-16. The following UVM women were chosen for the teams: Anne Margolis, link; and Lisa Fernandez, center halfback, in the first team and Sharon Farquharson, right wing, Karin Abrahamson, left halfback, Bonnie Hunt right halfback, Fran Fried link, and Barb Marticelli, sweeper, in the second team. Given honorable mention were Heide Pelkey, link, Ellen Cooke, right inner, and Pam Titus, goalie.

November 1 and 2 also found the UVM women's tennis squad in tournament action. Out of the 41 team field, UVM placed 6th with seven points in the New England Tennis Tournament. Advancing to the final round on Sunday, UVM's Alex Palmer and Sue Jenny dropped a 6-2, 6-3 decision to the top seeded Barbara Fischer and Vee Dunklee of Trinity.

Sunday, November 2, found the cross country team at UMass for their New England Tournament. Of the 14 participating schools, UVM finished third with 58 points behind first place UMass and second place Williams. Cathy Witcomb of Tufts won on the 3½ mile course with a time of 17:25. UVM's Jeanne Crane placed 3rd with the time of 19:01. Following her from UVM were Carol Degan, 5th, Kathy Glenney, 9th, Bev Howell, 20th and Jane Griffin, 21st. Both Miss Crane and Miss Degan will be participating in the National Finals in Ames, Iowa on November 15.

The women's swim team opened their season on Halloween evening, travelling to Plattsburgh for an invitational meet. UVM finished third behind a strong McGill team, and only 29 points behind the host Plattsburgh team. Senior Laura Schreinheim was the principle point maker, finishing first in the 100 yard individual medley, the 100 yard backstroke, and the 50 yard breaststroke.

The volleyball team also enjoyed their season opener on Thursday, October 30 defeating Castleton State, 2-0. Having only had one practice together as a team, the Catamounts dropped Castleton 14-12 in the first set, and 15-0 in the second.

After defeating Middlebury last week, the UVM field hockey team met with the Panthers again on Wednesday, only to be defeated 6-2. Gene Fagins scored both goals for UVM, placing them each in separate halves. Goalie Pam Titus made 7 saves for UVM.

Cross-Country Finishes Second In YanCon

On Saturday, November 1, the UVM Cross Country team placed second in the Yankee Conference Championship held at UMass. The Massachusetts Minutemen placed first for their sixth consecutive Championship. Third place was taken by Connecticut.

Coach Bill Nedde termed the performance "fantastick" since the Cats were runners up for their second straight year behind national power Massachusettes. Peter Wieth ran the best race of his career, placing 7th over the rugged UMass course. Lynn Capen, recovering from a leg injury, placed 10th and Dave Milligan ran 13th. Howdy Russell, showing a tremendous effort, finished in the 16th spot and saved the meet for the Cats. Dave Elliott rounded off the UVM scoring, placing 25th in the 50 man field. Bringing up the rear were Bob Stoehr, running 30th, and Dave Raner, finishing in the 33rd spot.

After this strong showing in the Yankee Conference Meet, the Cats now look forward to the New England Championships, Saturday November 8, in Boston.

Results: UMass 28, UVM 71, UConn 80, U Maine 86, UNH 95, B.U. 165, URI 209.

The top ten finishers were: Clark UConn, McGrail UMass, Reed UNH, LaFlemme UMaine, Sheerer UMass, Wieth UVM, Farmer UMass, Neil UMass, and Capen UVM.

Ski Team Looks For Title

by Jeff Green

The first snows have hit Mt. Mansfield, the ski shops are pushing their pre-season sales, and students are wondering where they are going to be skiing this year or whether that new pair of K-2's would break their account. But the operation of our ski team is a year-round job. Working with the finances, acquiring new skiers, working with manufacturers, and negotiating with various rules committees, has kept Coach Chip La Casse busy all year preparing for the upcoming season.

The team fared well last year, ranking second in the nation; a performance which could easily be equaled, if not bettered, this year. This makes the ski team the highest nationally ranked team this school has ever had.

We lost three fine skiers after 1975 graduation: Ex-Captain Dick Erdman, Ex-Captain Chris Brown, who now serves as the Alpine Coach along with Mickey Cochran, and the incomparable Petter Kongali, who dominated the jumping circuit during his four year stay here.

New additions to this year's team include Roger Holden, a jumper from Trondheim, Norway. For the past three years, Roger has earned a spot on the Norwegian National Team. He has quite an impressive record behind him, placing 7th in the European Championships, and coming in 10th in the senior division at Holmenkollen, although he won the junior division there. UVM is lucky to have this world class jumper, and you'll hear more from him as the season gets underway.

On the cross country squad, two U.S. National Team members have joined the ranks. Mark Quinlan and Mark Wagner won their respective events in the Junior National Championships. They will round off the running team, giving us the added depth we need.

New alpine skiers include four hopefuls: Doug Powell, from Connecticut and a recent graduate of the Mad River School, from N.Y. State Eric Goettsche, who won the Sugarloaf Downhill, and Ken Lane. Bob Rose, from Waitsfield, shows good potential, and with these four we have good hopes for future teams.

Returning to the alpine team are Captain elect Bill Roethbene, "Duddu" Bruce, Dave Dodge, Brookie Dodge, Kirk Dice, Brian Susslin, Kent Belden, Jeff Harrow, and Peter Teasdale. All are top ranked eastern and national racers and will pose quite a threat at this year's collegiate competitions.

On the cross country side, Morton Garuud and Trygve Kjolseth are back as our mainstays. Stan Dunklee hopes to return to school by this winter, but at present is now training for the Olympics and the upcoming tryouts. At this point it would be fitting to note that four UVM skiers have fine chances for the upcoming olympics in Innsbruck, Austria. Jay Rand will be jumping, as will Peter Kongali (on the Norwegian Team). Stan Dunklee will be running, and Joe Lamb has good chances to make the Nordic combined.

Our jumping team will certainly be one of the strongest in the U.S. Trygve Rolseth, always a challenge to Petter Tungsli, will be up front, along with Roger Halden. Trygve won the 1974 Eastern Championships. Joe Lamb will, hopefully, be with us. He, also, is off training this semester. Tom Lantz will be jumping, after being injured all last season, and home town jumper Denny Lambert, who comes through in the clutch, will round off that squad.

This year the NCAA's move back east, after being held out west for the past two winters. This gives us the "eastern" advantage, ice, instead of very soft snow, which gets very rutty and is hard to wax for. This makes it a whole different race – as long as we get the snow...

There will be more on each respective squad as the season nears and we all anticipate the first snows.

Women Netters Place Sixth In N.E.

Despite cold, wintry temperatures last weekend, the women's New England Intercollegiate Tennis Tournament was held at UMass. Forty-one New England colleges were represented – each school being allowed to enter 2 singles players and two doubles teams. The final draw consisted of 64 singles players and 64 doubles teams. Vermont's no. 1 doubles team, Alex Palmer and Sue Jenny, fought their way to the semi-finals of the tournament beating a team from Clark University, a team from Smith, UConn and Williams. In the semi-finals they bowed to No. 1 seeded Trinity, but not before displaying their spectacular net skills and teammanship.

Other Vermont competitors, Debi Bloom and Nancy Mullen gained single points for UVM by winning their first-round matches. Bloom beat a competitor from Clark University and then fell to Miss Silvers from Smith. Nancy Mullen defeated a girl from University of Rhode Island in the first round, losing in the second round to the No. 2 seed of the tournament, Miss Cadoff from Williams.

Vermont's No. 2 doubles team of Brownie Richards and Mary Dee gained another point for UVM but lost in the second round to a team from Green Mountain in three neck to neck sets.

Vermont in an unprecedented showing tied for sixth place in the 41 team field. Yale swept the tournament up with 18 points, followed by Williams, Brown, Middlebury, and Trinity. UVM tied in sixth place with Tufts (7 points). Springfield College took seventh place, Radcliffe was next with 6 points, while UConn and Brandeis tied for ninth.

In the UVM consolation round, Bloom and Mullen teamed up to bulldoze through Richards and Dee in a 3 out of 5 set match – taking with them the prize money.

L/L Religon Suite In Planning Stage

Some religion majors and other students are interested in exploring the idea of a suite in the Living/Learning Center. You are invited to an exploratory meeting on Friday, November 14 at the Religion Building, Room 201. There will be refreshments and all.

The theme for the suite is still very fluid. One thought is to focus on ritual in contemporary religious life: the forms (old and emerging), the power, existential significance and personal value of rituals of all kinds. This study could also include the pseudo-religious rituals of the profane culture (drugs, sex, modern music, art, dance, etc.). The general aim is to understand and encounter the phenomenon of ritual. People living in the suite may create and experiment with their own forms of ritual by participation and practice to supplement the theoretical observance and study of ritual. There may be better ideas if we brainstorm it. This is open to non-religion majors, too.

Between now and the meeting, if you wish to discuss the subject, contact Mr. Gussner in the Religion Building, second floor or John Dramer at 17 Robinson Hall.

A reminder that Lane Series tickets are still on sale, and available from the Lane Office, 234 Waterman, tel. 656-3418. Tickets are now on sale for the Dec. 16 "Nutcracker," by the Hartford Ballet and the Vermont Symphony, Dec. 8 and Dec. 10, in the six Bartok quartets.

A large variety of mini-courses, study groups, special activities and workshops are scheduled to begin at the UVM Church Street Center for Community Education this week. $2500 Prize For Essay

Students in college or graduate school have an opportunity to win a top award of $2,500 research or travel grant in an essay contest on welfare reform sponsored by the Institute for Socioeconomic Studies.

Leonard M. Greene, Institute president, said the award will be made for the best 10,000 word paper on the subject "Income Supplementation – A Solution to America's Welfare Crisis."

A second prize of $1,000 cash and up to 10 consolation prizes of $100 each also will be awarded. The staff and trustees of the Institute will be judges.

The research program of the non-profit foundation of White Plains, N.Y. is focused on exploring possible reform of United States welfare policy.

Deadline for entry of papers is March 1, 1976. The essay contest winners will receive their awards at a presentation ceremony in Washington, D.C. early in May, 1976. While in Washington, both the essay winner and runner-up will meet with ranking members of Congress in a symposium on welfare reform to be sponsored by The Institute for Socioeconomic Studies.

In announcing the competition, Mr. Greene said its objective is "to encourage America's students to think constructively about the vast problems caused by the failure of present U.S. socioeconomic policy."

Entrants' papers, he said, may give consideration to such topics as an evaluation of existing welfare programs, techniques of income supplementation, and how work incentives are affected by present welfare policy and how that might be altered by adoption of an income supplement.

The Institute will have the option of publishing winning papers, Mr. Greene said. During 1975, The Institute has published two monographs, "Great Britain's Tax Credit Income Supplement", incorporating a paper by the Rt. Hon. Lord Barber, T.D., and "Social Welfare Abroad", a comparative study of the social insurance and public assistance programs of industrialized democracies throughout the world by Bette K. Fishbein, staff economist of The Institute for Socioeconomic Studies.

Currently planned for publication is an analysis by former U.S. Representative Martha W. Griffiths of Congress' next major effort to develop welfare reform legislation.

The Institute reserves the right to cancel the first and second prizes if, in the sole judgment of the judges, no suitable papers are submitted.

Registration forms and complete information about the student essay contest may be obtained by writing to Essay Contest Director, The Institute for Socioeconomic Studies, Airport Road, White Plains, N.Y. 10604.

Affirmative Action

The U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare is in the process of reviewing UVM's Affirmative Action Program to determine whether the University is in compliance with federal civil rights laws prohibiting discrimination against women and minorities in institutions of higher education. Three representatives from the Boston Office of Civil Rights or HEW will be on campus from November 18 to 22 to conduct an on-site compliance review. Anyone interested in discussing issues related to women and minorities on campus is encouraged to drop by the Faculty Senate Conference Room, 313 Waterman Building, next week. "Drop in" hours will be posted outside the door.

Environmental Auction

Vermont Tomorrow (the citizen-based, non-profit, tax-exempt environmental organization) and Vermont Tomorrow Legislative Action, (the lobbying wing of VT) have scheduled their annual meeting and auction for November 21, 1975, at Memorial Lounge, Waterman Building, UVM, Burlington.

Robinson Hall, the environmental dormitory, will be hosting the event, which will commence at 6 p.m. The agenda is as follows:

6 p.m. Welcome, Cheryl King

6:10 p.m., Auction

7:15 p.m. Talk – "What is Today's Vermont Tomorrow?" David Goldberg, Exec. Dir., VT

7:45 p.m. Business meeting

8:30 p.m. Dessert and discussion

9:00 p.m. Film, titled Chester Grimes – Vermont and Vermonter. The way it was and sometimes is. (This film is the first in a series of environmentally related films to be shown on the UVM campus, sponsored by Robinson Hall).

The public is invited to attend any and all events.

Proceeds from the auction will go to VTLA to help finance its lobbying effort in the upcoming legislative session. VTLA will focus on 3 major areas in the 1976 session: one area will be work on open space tax legislation conducted primarily through membership in the Open Space Tax Coalition. A second area will be support of legislation affecting energy planning, conservation, production, distribution and policy formation, and the third area will be promotion of legislation increasing agricultural diversification and self-sufficiency.

January UYA Openings

There will be several openings in the University Year for Action (UYA) program beginning in January. UYA is a student/intern program administered by the Office of Volunteer Programs at UVM. Participating students work full-time for a year in a community agency in Vermont. In return for their services, UYA interns receive a monthly stipend of approximately $200.00 to help defray their living expenses. UYA interns must be willing to integrate their project with a full-time academic program. Most students fulfill their academic requirements through independent study, readings and research courses, a core course offered to all UYA's, and/or regular academic classes.

The advantages of being a UYA intern are many. It is an excellent opportunity to test the theories of the classroom against the realities of the world. The internship is a means of participating in the transformation of some of the undesirable social realities that surround us today. The experience is also an asset when one enters the job market in the future. (A large percentage of former UYA's are currently employed in the agency where they did their student internship.)

If you are at all interested in this program, contact us now. A member of our staff will be happy to sit down and talk with you in detail about UYA. We are located in Mansfield House, 25 Colchester Ave., UVM, and our telephone number is 656-2062.

Summer School In Norway

NORTHFIELD, Minnesota–The University of Oslo International Summer School will hold its 30th session from June 26 to August 6, 1976, in Oslo, Norway. 300 students and teachers from about 45 nations are expected to attend the six-week program studying a wide variety of liberal arts courses both on the graduate and undergraduate levels.

Since the founding of the school as a program for American students in 1947, the curriculum has been steadily broadened and over 7500 students from 111 countries have attended. The gathering of people from all parts of the world in the friendly setting of this North-European country creates a stimulating atmosphere of good will and understanding.

Except for Norwegian language courses, all subjects are taught in English. Applicants from the U.S. and Canada are required to have two years of college. Credit is certified by the University of Oslo and is transferable to the majority of American universities.

Applications from the U.S. and Canada are received and processed at the Summer School's North American Admissions Office located at St. Olaf College, Northfield, MN 55057. A catalogue and further information are available upon request.

The Exchange

by Alice D. Ostwald
Counseling and Testing

The idea of "THE EXCHANGE" is to be able to have a dialogue with the Campus Community about matters of concern so that they can – hopefully – be aired and perhaps changed. This week we have had quite a change of pace with the letters. If you do not know where to go with your requests, we are delighted to help and research them out for you. However, the person who wants the music turned up in the Simpson dining halls could suggest that it be done there. Likewise with the complaint the the practice rooms in the new Music Building are kept between 75 and 80 degrees, which is too hot to practice." Surely someone in the building could help you out there? Another student says: 'it would be a good idea to have the University subsidize the students for marijuana. If everyone paid a reefer fee of say, $40 a semester the school could buy thousands of dollars worth of drugs. What a party!' Perhaps true, but a bit farout for this community. Agreed? A diligent comparison shopper also noticed price differences with canned juice at the Campus Store. Some of these problems have universal interest and some are fun to read, but many fall into the category of simply asking on the spot for something to be done. Here a direct approach is appropriate rather than expecting someone else to do the asking for us – or simply buy what we need at a price we feel is o.k. After all, the UVM store is for our convenience and is not supposed to do more than break even and doesn't really have a big staff to deal immediately with the changing prices.

We love to hear of problems – but bring us some with a bit more depth: if we can do anything, we will.

Airline Fare Increase

The Civil Aeronautics Board (CAB) recently approved a 3% domestic airline fare increase to take effect Saturday, November 15. The CAB said the fare hike is necessary to cover climbing costs in fuel and other areas, and without it, the airlines would have an "insufficient level of earnings" or would have to cut service to an "inadequate" level.

The airlines finally received the CAB government approval. Having tried for 5 months to win domestic fare increases, the airlines were, of course, relieved but not entirely appeased.

The CAB rejected the earlier proposals in June because the statistics for the year ending June 30, 1975 showed that a fare increase would produce an excessive return on investment for the airlines.

CAB Chairman John E. Robson stated recently that fare increase proposals would be approved only if they satisfied the board's current tests, which includes forbidding increases in regular fares which are designed to compensate for discount rate fares.

Four major airlines recently took the CAB to court on its policy of fare increase turndowns in June. They believed that the board was acting politically, abruptly changing its ground rules for what constitutes acceptable fare increases without public notice of confirmation.

A Weekend Of Yoga

An intensive Yoga workshop is planned for the Burlington Area on the Weekend of November 21 through 23. This special event, the first of its kind held here, will include Hatha Yoga (practice of physical movement exercises), meditation, singing and dancing, Yoga psychology discussions, and delicious vegetarian meals.

This weekend workshop will serve both as an introduction for beginners and a beautiful experience for adepts. The event will be directed by Yogiraj Shri Khanna, founder and spiritual director of the Maha Yoga East-West Center for Meditation in Newton, Mass.

Yogiraj Khanna, born into a traditional spiritual family in India, studied under several major spiritual teachers, and brings to this event 34 years of study and devotion to Yoga principles and practices. During his 16 years in the West, he has instructed thousands of students, as well as training over 500 teachers in the United States, Canada and Europe. During the past decade, he has taught at the college level, directed many seminars, lectured, authored five books on Yoga, and done post-doctoral research in education, philosophy, psychology and Eastern religions.

The workshop will be held at Ethan Allen Child Care Center in Winooski. Mail registrations will be accepted at The Frayed Page, 182 Main Street, Burlington. The fee for the entire weekend is $25 plus meals. For further information, call 862-3949. Checks should be made payable to The Yoga Society of Burlington.

Due to the nature of the workshop, participants are encouraged to bring comfortable, loose clothing, a mat or cushion, and, if musically inclined, an instrument. The group will meet initially at 8 p.m. on Friday, November 21. It is possible to attend the total weekend, or a one-day experience, yet in order to plan the meals, participants are asked to register by November 14. This workshop will not be a religious indoctrination.

Medieval/Renaissance Lectures

Dearly Beloved lovers of things old and beautiful, Many Things:

Kalends for fall semester '75 as time remains:

Monday, 17 November, 7:30 in 216 Commons, Professor John Hannigan, philosopher from St. Mike's, will talk on ethical philosophy and individualism in the Middle Ages.

Tuesday, 18 November, 4:30 in 216 Commons, Jim Howe on Marlowe's Tamburlaine and the Renaissance belief in man as a semi-divinity.

Tuesday, 2 December, 4:30 in 216 Commons, Bill Mann on the mystic's union with God and the problem it raises for Christianity: Middle Ages to 16th century.

Thursday, 4 December, 4:30 in 216 Commons, Pieter Wesseling on Fuenteovejuna, see further below.

Tuesday, 9 December, 4:30 in 216 Commons as part of the class, student Hank McCoy on the Medici banking system in Florence.

THINGS IN THE WORKS

St. Nicholas Fest: after the afternoon performance of the Baroque Ensemble, we will have a covered dish supper (M/RP will supply beverages), with student medieval dancers demonstrating while we eat. Gift-giving and party will follow. Last year this event was a great success. Families, kids welcome. Other events likely. Each person who will come puts his (her) name in a box, and draws someone else's. He (she) gives a giftie to the person drawn, MAX EXPENSE $.50. So: give Howe or Faith Fuller name(s) of those who plan to attend (1) dinner, and/or (2) gift-sharing. Gifts to be keyed to the recipient. Diners should bring a covered dish able to feed twice the number coming with them (family of four, a dish for eight, etc.) Food coordinator: Tricia Johns.

One M/RP suite vacancy for spring. Let interested students know and contact Andrea or Howe.

As all should know by now, the Papal keys to the M/RP pass from the tiring clutches of Jim Howe to the youthful, agile, and still strong embrace of Innocent the III, once known as Al Andrea to his family, for spring. However, volunteers or nominations for Al's successor, to assume command January 1977, will be gratefully received by Jim Howe or Al Andrea immediately.

The idea of having a monthly faculty symposium, at which some appointed volunteer might offer research in progress or near completion for the group's discussion and suggestions, at another prof's house of an evening, may have merit. Reactions? Volunteers?

Hitler At Home In U.N.

In an Arab-backed resolution passed by the UN General Assembly this week, Zionism was equated with "racism and racial discrimination." The enemies of Israel have achieved enormous success in discrediting the Jewish state with the passage of this resolution.

The United Nations has sunken to new depths of depravity in its efforts to condemn Zionism. Anti-Semitism has now become an official policy of the UN, as that is the hidden message inferred in the resolution. Israel's Ambassador Herzog commented, that, "Hitler would feel at home in the UN, considering the present atmosphere." Facism and oppression are becoming increasingly evident in the action of the United Nations.

The original concept of the UN of preserving peace and friendly interaction between nations, has been perverted by the domination of the Third World, who seek the expulsion and destruction of the State of Israel. Instead of aiding the cause of peace, the Zionist resolution can only hurt the Mid-East peace efforts.

A reappraisal of the United State's role in the UN should be made. America's membership in an organization that practices racism, while professing to condemn it, is contrary to our concepts expressed in the Constitution. Nazism had its beginnings in criticism of Judaism. One wonders if the UN is on the same route.

Facts About Concert

To the Editor:

This letter is a clarification of the Lane Series participation in the ROLLING THUNDER REVUE concert on Saturday, November 8. Dylan's manager contacted us and asked us to be the local coordinator. The Lane Series was not given a percentage. A flat fee was agreed upon which the Lane Series would get, regardless of ticket sales. The Lane Series did not set ticket prices, nor did Lane members get complementary tickets. Our fee was nominal, but we thought it in the best interests of the University community for us to promote the concert.

There was an oral agreement that we would have one radio advertisement at 10:00 a.m. on the day of the ticket sales, with tickets going on sale two hours later at 12:00 noon. We did not think this was fair for the Lane patrons — the UVM students and staff, and the Burlington public; thus our resolution was to announce on radio the specifics of ticket sales at 8:00 a.m. on the day of ticket sales.

Because of the long line for tickets, Jerry Seltzer (the ROLLING THUNDER representative), Mr. Jack Trevithick, Vice-President Barbara Snelling, Mr. Richard Scott-Smith (the UVM Security Chief), Mr. Dennis Lambert, Dr. Keith Miser and Mr. David Nestor (resprsenting Student Association), decided to change the hall to the Patrick Gym, a larger hall which made reserved seats impossible. At this point it was felt that it would be in the best interest of the University to have Vice President Snelling as local coordinator. Under her guidance, S.A. was put in charge of technical production and the Lane Series was put in charge of ticket sales, ticket takers, and financial administration. The security was under care of Mr. Richard Scott-Smith. Ultimately, it was further agreed that the flat fee for services was to be shared by the Lane Series and Student Association.

The concert was not oversold. The gym was rated for this concert to have a 5500 person capacity, and 5480 tickets were sold, not including passes for the ROLLING THUNDER REVUE and for S.A. and Lane workers. The ROLLING THUNDER REVUE representative, Jerry Seltzer, stated that Dylan's wish was to play before small audiences, as previously publicized, was misleading. Variety reports that in Providence, R.I., last week, Dylan played two shows of 13,500 persons each.

Thanks To Committee

To the Editor:

During the last six or seven months I served as a student member of the Presidential Search Committee. Last Friday, November 7th, our search ended as the Board of Trustees unanimously selected Dr. Lattie Coor as the next UVM President.

Out of my experience has grown a great respect for the other eleven members of the Search Committee. The process to select Dr. Coor was thoughtful and reflects positively on the committee members. Our discussions as a committee were always intelligent and stimulating, hence, making this an exciting learning experience.

It is my hope that students be allowed to participate in more UVM governmental decisions. This type of experience contributes to a student's learning as well as giving the student input into the destiny of UVM.

As our end has been achieved and our meetings over, I want to thank the committee for what they have given me.

Sincerely,
David Schwartz

Smoking Affects Others

To the Editor:

In response to A.C. Fischer's letter (Vermont Cynic 11/6/75), I must say that I share her distaste for "Kleenex tasting bread" and can understand her frustration at the power of mass media to control and direct people's thoughts. However, I think she should consider the inconsistencies apparent in her own reasoning concerning smoking wherever she pleases before she allows herself to "give up hope."

First of all, I must dismiss the advertising issue, although important in itself, as being non-essential to the basic question of the "Non-Smokers Rights" that A.C. is determined to ignore. I then ask A.C. to consider the fact that when she chooses to light up a cigarette, she has made a decision that affects everyone around her. This is quite different from the case of the "Kleenex tasting bread" eater whose decision, however unwise it may be, affects only him/herself. It doesn't seem kind or fair that A.C. should subject her companions, who may be neither smokers nor "Kleenex tasting bread" eaters, to the pervading presence of cigarette smoke which they no more want to inhale than she wants to eat "Kleenex tasting bread."

In A.C.'s desire to defy the power of mass media and the authority of Cambridge, MA law-makers, she has shown a gross lack of concern for those in her immediate surroundings. If it wasn't for that lack of concern in society in general, perhaps there wouldn't be a need for laws such as the Cambridge one in the first place.

Geology 52 Response

To the Editor:

In response to the letter of two weeks ago concerning "Geology 52," I would like to state that I, a fellow member of the class, did not witness the alleged chalk-throwing event, although I was most definitely at that particular oil derricks lecture. I concede that it is possible that I blinked my eye at the very second the incident occurred; however, I believe that it takes a piece of chalk flying through the air longer than an eye takes to blink. As far as accusations that I snored right through the incident, I offer the fact that Environmental Geology is one of the few classes I find interesting enough not only to get out of bed for but to stay fully awake for.

If the chalk truly was thrown, I agree that it was an uncalled-for act of horrendous violence, and that the professor in question should be tarred and feathered on the stage of good old 101 Votey. Maybe you would find that more interesting than oil derricks? I personally find Rhodes a good lecturer, even if he is from Missouri. He may be a little emotional, but this world could use a little more emotion (not to mention my love life).

If, as I would argue, the incident did not occur, then the letter was a cruel and unnecesary slander, and the author ought to be tarred and feathered. Or, more appropriately, boiled in oil.

The Other Side

Davis No Exception

To the Editor:

I need not tell anybody about the elected official syndrome. Inevitably it happens. Whenever a seemingly honest man is elected to an office, his immunization to dishonesty and corruption seems to crumble and the little germ finds a nook to inhabit indefinitely within this poor soul. I can't explain this phenomenon. Perhaps someday the medical profession can come up with an effective vaccination to combat this pesty fellow. But until then, ethical behavior will never be the forte of an elected official.

"What has all this got to do with anything?" you ask yourself. Well, it has to do with an official that we, the students of UVM elected last year, the President of S.A. Yes, the bug has got the better of our man. As the doors were about to be opened to the patient ticket buyers of the Bob Dylan show, Staige allowed his innumerable stage crew to occupy vast quantities of prime seating area before the masses were let in. In fact, a friend talked to a fellow who claimed he was fifth in line and couldn't get closer than the fifth row.

Some of you may say that this is nothing new, and sure enough, it has happened before under the official guidance of Our Man. I myself didn't attend the New Riders concert (which in itself brings up another sore spot to mind) but I understand the first few people in line were disappointed to find S.A. workers guarding both ends of the first four or five rows not allowing anyone else to sit there. Also at the Marshall Tucker concert last year, S.A. thwarted our hopes of getting anywhere inside the first four or five rows. I must say that I'm a little fed up with the behavior of our S.A. President in these matters. Perhaps this sounds like sour grapes, and maybe it is, but after he confronted me at the Dylan concert (I was an usher at the door) with the accusation that one of our ushers was saving seats (four to be exact) in the sixth row and told me that his S.A. workers weren't getting any seats, I sort of blew my proverbial stack. In actuality, less than half of the twenty-four ushers from the Lane Series had seats and the House Manager in charge of the ushers had to stay in the lobby during the entire show because of his duties which he assumed admirably.

Staige, you are not an exception to the rule.

Smoking Unpleasant

To the Editor:

In response to the "No Smoking?" letter from A.C. Fischer last week, I feel compelled to point out one simple fact which A.C. seems to have missed.

The fact is, smoking cigarettes is a pastime which does directly affect any innocent bystanders who happen to be around. Eating junk food may well be as injurious to the health of the eater as smoking is to the smoker, but eating does not physically affect any observers of the act.

Therefore, it follows that the general public ought to have some say in a smoker's pollution of their mutual air, whereas anyone who chooses to stuff his/her face with garbage has every right to do so.

If seeing "the inconsistencies in some people's reasoning" makes you "give up hope" as you say, you had better throw in the towel right now, A.C. Take a look at your own logic (or illogic) next time before complaining about someone else's.

Helen Torr

Davis's Dirty Tricks

To the Editor:

Commendation should be given to Mr Trevetick, director of the Lane Series, and Larry Van Benthuysen, Director of Public Relations for UVM, for the manner in which they handled the recent Dylan concert.

There is no other city of Burlington's size that could claim the quality entertainment that is continually presented here.

It is unfortunate, however, that S.A. President Stage Davis does not deserve the same congratulations. His last minute bargaining, or rather blackmailing, was designed solely to save face because of his blunders involving scheduling the New Riders Concert. If not for the money received from the Dylan concert, Davis would have depleted the budget for the Concert Bureau.

It seems as though Davis is serving the interests of himself and a small, elite group of friends and not the interests of the students. When campaigning for S.A. President, he promised to step down as head of the Concert Bureau if elected. This has not occurred. Is this the kind of honesty we can expect from our S.A. President? It's time he should live up to his promises.

No Kake Walk

To the Editor:

Last week's Cynic had an article which stated that the Number One objective of the Greek Coordinating Council was to bring "Kake Walk" back. This statement could not be further from the truth! The G.C.C. has never made any plans for bringing this tradition back to UVM.

The real objective of the council is to unify the Greek houses for common causes, such as Rush, Greek Week, Winter Week, raising money for a variety of philanthropies, and solving problems common to all houses. This is what the Greek Coordinating Council does!

The article also inferred that spirit within the system was missing. Spirit, being an abstract quantity, is pretty hard to put a value on. But do you think it's possible to do what I've listed above without the cooperation and enthusiasm of the whole Greek community?

I suggest to all with questions concerning Greeks to look around, read, and learn all you can so your judgment is based on fact.

I hope what has been written here has removed the misconceptions of last week's article.

Thank you,

Welcome Concert Input

To the Editor:

This past weekend, the Student Association, S.A. Concert Bureau, and the Lane Series offered a musical weekend unique in the history of Vermont: New Riders of the Purple Sage, Chick Corea and the Rolling Thunder Revue with Bob Dylan and Joan Baez.

We mention this for several reasons. The first and most obvious is that we are pleased with the success of all three shows; NRPS sponsored by S.A. Concerts, Chick Corea by the Lane Series, and Dylan, a combined effort of the two organizations. This is in no way an attempt at self-praise, but many hours went into the planning of the shows and the response has been excellent.

The second point to be considered deals with criticism. When used in a constructive manner, this is our major resource for self-evaluation and improvement. Many concerned students offer their ideas and energies to improve our programs, and we appreciate this.

We do not welcome, however, criticism based on misinformation and poor understanding. The letter by Z.C. ("Poor Planning by S.A.", Vermont Cynic, Nov. 6) is a case in point. The facts should now be clarified:

1. The New Riders concert sold over 3,000 tickets. The Corea concert sold just over 2,000. Neither concert was sold out. How then can one say there was "more enthusiasm" for Chick Corea?

2. Not only was S.A. Concerts' budget not "depleted", but it is now back up to the original allocation. We hope to provide at least four more concerts before June.

Any member of S.A. is welcome to have input into concert planning. In the next few weeks we will publish an article in the Cynic explaining the problems inherent in concert production at UVM.

We mean to be an open, accessible organization, and we welcome your ideas. All we ask is that an investigation of the facts be made before judgment is passed.

Sincerely,
Staige Davis

Lack Of Concern

To the Editor:

On behalf of the non-smokers of the campus, I would like to take this opportunity to reply to A.C. Fisher's childish and self-centered letter that appeared in last week's Cynic.

Ms. Fischer is obviously concerned about my health in that she rants and raves against refined sugar, Kleenex, and "enriched bread," but her main concern seems to be with my "infringement" upon her "right" to smoke anywhere she chooses. She cites the fact that the mass media was used by the American Cancer Society to spread the word that smoking is dangerous. I wonder if she would have been equally offended by the ads that were put out by the March of Dimes during the nineteen fifties warning about the dangers of polio. Does she feel that it is the right of mine owners to expose their workers to dangerous asbestos fibers without protection?

Does this woman realize that her smoking infringes upon my health? As far as banning refined sugar, I am not spooning it into your coffee, Ms. Fischer, but when you sit in a crowded room next to me and light up one of your super special 120 millimeter virility symbols, the smoke invariably permeates the entire room, causing me to feel sick to my stomach and unable to breathe. There are many people at this University with respiratory ailments, all of whom do a little at the sight of your exercising your "right" to pollute the air.

Did you know, Ms. Fischer, that the smoke you spew forth from your lungs back into the air causes the same effects on the non-smoker sitting next to you? Your children are much more likely to suffer placental oxygen lack & as a result develop a type of brain damage than a child whose mother does not smoke. Ms. Fischer, if you sit next to a pregnant woman and smoke, that smoke can filter down into her lungs, across the placenta, and right to her baby.

I invite you to come to the cadaver lab at the medical building and see the lung of a smoker. It is an object resembling a sponge that has been soaked in soot for a period of years. A normal lung looks like a pink sponge.

Ms. Fischer, I am sorry that you feel you have a right to kill. I sympathize with your drug habit, (for that is what it is), but like all drug users, you need help, not the opportunity to infest others with your habit.

I think that you should reexamine your "right" and ask yourself if you really need to inflict suffering on those of us with asthma, emphysema, and other respiratory ailments. Do you really want to stunt the development of your children? Is it really so necessary for you to prove yourself by belligerently lighting up in a public place? Being an R.A., I hope you may come to some sort of mature decision on this matter and realize that clean air and the right to breath is the birthright of all people.

Ruined Evening

To the Editor:

I don't think much of the obnoxious male who sat in about the third row of the Cook auditorium and who decided to light up a joint during the last twenty minutes of the Clark Gable–Marilyn Monroe movie last Thursday night.

I can't think of a better way to ruin an evening for those of us who hate the smell of the stuff. It makes me very ill very quickly. Why should I have to leave because of someone else's filthy, rotten, illegal, disgusting habit? The least he could have done was wait until the movie was over, as he had lasted almost two hours without it.

Non-Smoker Replies

To the Editor:

Regarding A.C. Fischer's letter of October 30 condoning the right of smokers to discomfort non-smokers, her opinions seem typical of the inconsideration shown by many smokers. There is a total inconsistency in this reasoning.

If I choose to eat "refined sugar products, processed cheese or white Kleenex tasting 'enriched' bread" in her presence, she does not have to eat them also. Yet when she smokes in my presence, I have to breathe her smoke. I find this unpleasant, discomforting, and at times nauseating, as I find all air pollution.

Her second point is a gross misstatement. Non-smokers are not demanding a ban on the sale of cigarettes, nor are we challenging her right to smoke. We are only requesting that she not smoke in our presence.

Please. It's our air, too.

Looking For Louise On A Cold Windy Day

Part VI

by Gregory Katz

Jeddyboy apparently never saw me lying on his floor. My sleep ended quickly when he put Coltrane on his stereo at medium to high volume. The introduction to "A Love Supreme" rang through my head. Good morning.

I looked up from the floor. I had been lying next to a pile of sticky orange paint. I must have rolled over in the night, because my stomach was a kind of dull orange. Something was sticking in my hair. The sun was high in the sky, sending beams through Jeddy's window. I saw him coming out of the bedroom naked, his thin body taut and his eyes glazed over.

Then he saw me, "Oh Greg, what's up? When you get here?"

"When the sun came up."

"What's been going on?"

"Just a ton of shit, Jeddy. I think I'm now a political prisoner. I tried to overthrow the Refinery Robots."

"Is that a ball team?"

"No man, I guess it's just Mobil. Anyway I gotta go to court. I don't wanna."

"What are you talking about anyway?"

"I don't know, Jeddy, gimme some coffee and I'll think it over."

I looked up from the floor.

I had been lying next to a pile of sticky orange paint...

I wanted coffee bad, and I could smell it brewing. Jeddy ignored me. Coltrane was chanting "A Love Supreme." Somewhere a district court judge was looking at a sheet of paper with my name on it. Industrial espionage. Hah! I had as much chance as George McGovern. Well it wasn't so bad. I mean I've had brushes with the law before. Breach of peace here, breach of peace there. Charged with assault once. It was jive, I mean I'm not exactly a tough guy. The assault charge looks bad on my record. Industrial espionage has a nicer ring to it. Maybe the underground press would pick up on it. I could see myself on tv with a banner saying "Smash the Machine" and my mouth frothing. Then again that might jeopardize my chance of broadcasting the Series. I couldn't figure out all the angles.

Jeddy brought me the coffee. It went straight to my gut. I went to the toilet and eliminated last night's pizza from my system.

By the time I came out the door Eddy was there!

Eddy came up and hugged me. Goddamn it was nice to see him.

"We", he said, "Are going to Montreal tonight to see Archie Shepp." I came up early so I could round up you guys. But since you're both here I don't have to. Where have you been living anyway Greg?"

"I been living at the Hollow Man Pizza Shop mostly, and in the car a lot. Spend my days at the gym playing hoop, dreaming about baseball season, missing Ingrid, missing you, wishing it was summer. Then at night I make pizzas and go crazy. When does Archie play?"

"The first show is at nine. We gotta get there early, sit at the front tables with our feet on the stage. I hope he's got a good man on piano tonight."

"Shit man, I gotta work tonight."

"Can it Greg. I'm taking you to Montreal."

"Chinooski'll fire me."

"Who's Chinooski?"

"I'm not really sure." All of a sudden I wasn't really sure McCoy was playing his solo in the back. There's that one section, right before Coltrane explodes in with his sax, that has everything in it. I listened.

Coltrane came back in. OK.

Eddy and I went out to call Chinooski. It felt good walking down the street with him. It had been a long tense time for me since the summer, and some of my tension usually slid away when we got together.

He asked about Ingrid. I told him it was the same old story, nothing more, nothing less. He told me he was writing a new song every day almost. Eddy played piano, and he was good. Since high school I had heard his playing get stronger and higher. There was one day when I listened to him in 11th grade when I thought he would take off into outer space. Since then he's just gotten better and better, and deeper into it. I wanted to hear his new songs.

We got to a phone booth. I dropped in a dime and called Hank at his home. I hadn't figured out what I wanted to say yet, but I knew I was going to Montreal.

"Hello." Hank's voice sounded like his face. I held the phone a few inches from my ear.

"Hank, hi, this is Greg. Listen, I want to thank you for springing me last night. I'd still be there if it wasn't for you."

"What 'dya call for Greg?"

"I'm not coming in tonight."

"Whatteyamean you're not coming in? Who's gonna roll em out all night? I can't close up shop because you're upset about the law."

"I'm not that upset. I just wanta go to Montreal and let some music come into me. There's too much tension in me. The sargeant was right. I'm unemployable."

"So what do I do?"

"Hank, seriously, I think you should roll them out yourself. It's been years since you did it. It would be good for you, help you get back into the real world."

"Kid," he said, "I always liked you. I gave you that job even though I knew you never worked in no joint in New Haven. I figured if you went to all that trouble of giving me a phony number you must have needed the job. But now, I am afraid you must become an ex-Hollow Man. So long, and good luck with the trial."

"Hank, wait..." It was too late, he had hung up.

I called back. "Hank, that's o.k., listen I'll drop the bail money off at the shop. And I'm sorry."

"Sure kid." Then he was gone.

I felt kind of weird after that. Eddy and I bopped along for a while, looking at the stores. Eddy thought Burlington was a pit. He was right. He lived out in the woods with his piano. In fact he first got laid under a piano out in some school in Michigan. He got some young woman to listen to his songs, and things took off from there. I told him about my brush with the law the night before. Eddy just laughed. He always laughed when something bad happened to me. If I had gone to see him the night Ingrid came home drunk he would have laughed and told me to keep it together. He was vague in situations like that. He didn't believe in sympathy.

"But I'm gonna need a lawyer. That costs money. I hate going to court. I'll need to rent a jacket and a tie. This is serious."

It is your national right to hijack a motor boat and drive it into a tanker...

"Call William Kunstler, Greg. I'm sure he would agree this is a landmark case involving intricate questions of civil liberties. Or maybe try the Boston Strangler. It is your national right to hijack a motorboat and drive it into a tanker."

"Thanks a lot Eddy."

We walked into the Lusty Buffer. This was a bar where we had first hit town together years ago. Eddy and I pulled into Burlington in my Chevy back in late August of 73. We were homeless, so we would buy the Free Press and come to the Lusty Buffer to make phone calls looking for apartments. The owner liked us and bought us beers. This tended to cloud our thought processes, and after a week we ended up on a third floor of a condemned building on Wells St. The first week we set up a waterbed in the livingroom. Sure enough when Susan came to visit me for the weekend we broke the damn thing. The water leaked out slowly, but when we were done fucking we were almost sunk. I woke up Eddy, quick, and we packed our stuff back into the Chevy and took off. Just hit 89 and kept going. We had to leave the bed there. I figure the two tons of water eventually flooded the whole house, and probably drowned a few of the rats. But the Lusty Buffer remained our friend. It had nice memories.

The bartender came over. He didn't remember us.

"Could I have a mug of Moose Piss?" Eddy asked politely.

The bartender rolled his eyes. He had dark curly hair and a mustache. Very definitely a bartender.

"What do you want?"

"Moose Piss."

"He means Ballantine Ale, buddy. That's just what he calls it. We'll have two ales." I explained.

He set us up with two tall ones. I took a nice swig and smiled. Industrial espionage. Pizzaman. Counterperson. Ball player. Lover. Man of letters. None of it worked.

"Eddy," I said with a smile, "I'm turning myself in."

"Forget it Greg. They won't take you."

Halfway through those first beers we decided to call Poot. He was a good buddy of ours who lived in Hinesburg. I went to the booth and dropped in a dime.

Poot answered after a few rings.

"Poot, hi, listen, we're going to Montreal to see Archie Shepp. It's a celebration. I got arrested last night and fired this morning. I might stay in Montreal and go underground. But you should come."

"Great, great. We can go in my car. I just bought it on Saturday. I want to try it out."

"What is it?"

"It's a green Plymouth. A '55."

"Convertible?"

"Nope, it's a hardtop. But it's got class. It moves."

"Is it ready to go to Montreal."

"Yup. I got the plates and everything. I'll just bring it in and we can get going."

"O.K. Poot. Meet us at Jeddyboy's around four or so. We want to get there early and stay all night."

"Right. I'll bring Reed. He's been visiting this week."

"See you later."

I went back to the bar. Eddy was into more Moose Piss. I told him we were meeting Poot and Reed at four.

At about 4:30 there was a loud battering noise outside Jeddyboy's window. I looked out and saw a big green machine sputter to a halt. Poot got out with a big grin on his face and waved at me. I could tell he liked his car. Then Reed came around from the other side. He was wearing a white shirt and a dark brown tie. He had on this tan raincoat that was probably some famous brand or something. I looked at the blue smoke trailing into the sky behind Poot's Plymouth.

We went on the steps to meet them. I crossed the street to look at the car. It did not have class. It was just a dumpy, square, rotting machine. The hood was tied down with bailing wire. The muffler was hanging low and didn't work. I looked at the windshield. It was inspected through December.

"How do you like my machine?" yelled Poot from Jeddy's frontsteps.

"Poot my boy, I think this is the first mistake in your long automotive career. First off its a hardtop, and winters in Vermont demand convertibles. And second it just looks static. I'll bet it shimmies at 40."

Poot's face dropped for a second. Then he smiled, "But look at the transmission. It's got Powerglide. And the steering wheel. The lime green seats. It's got everything."

Poot really had good taste in cars most of the time. In Boulder he had bought a '63 Olds convertible that was bright purple with a white top. Much as I loved my Chevy I thought his Olds had more going for it. And before that he had a cream-colored Benz with red leather seats. But this heap didn't have it.

Reed wanted to eat before we left. So we went out to find some food. Eddy wanted to find a vegetarian restaurant so he could have good rice and vegetables. Reed was starving and wanted chicken. Poot wanted to stay home and wire up the muffler so it would get through customs. Jeddy, shit, Jeddy wanted to do everything.

So we left Poot with his car and walked around downtown. Reed ordered Chicken Orientale at some hippy joint. But they didn't have vegetables to please Eddy, so me and Eddy went to the Indian restaurant for curried rice and vegetables. I sat and drank water while Eddy ate. He ate quickly, cause we were in a hurry. Then we went back to get Reed at the hippy joint. Reed was finished, and was standing out on the street.

"Let's go Reed. It's getting late."

"Poot just went in. He's hungry and he ordered dinner."

"Oh shitfuck," I said. I wanted to get going. It was pushing 5:30 and the show started at 8:00.

"Take it easy Greg," said Eddy.

I went to the subshop around the corner and ordered an onion bagel with creamcheese. They stuck it in some heat machine, closed up the machine, and pushed a button. Steam rose up on all sides of the machine. Then they took the bagel out, wrapped it in tin foil, and handed it to me.

"That will be $.35 sir."

I paid him and walked out. I ate it slowly sitting on the sidewalk. Finally Poot was done eating and we were all together.

When we got in the car it sagged to a few inches off the ground. The engine kicked.

On the way to 89 Reed spoke up, "Wait. Go to the liquor store first. I want to buy some cognac."

"Fuck cognac. We can buy it there." I said.

"OK."

As Poot sped up on the highway ramp the muffler got louder and louder. It sounded like open warfare. The car shook. We reached 55 miles per hour. We were off.

Child Safety Caps

by Peter Cobb

At one time or another probably every adult has been unable to open a child proof jar of medicine. Usually, after the initial frustration, one is able to press down and turn the cap opening the jar. Hopefully young children who have had the same experience were not able to get at the medicine.

Child safety caps resulted from the passage of the Poison Prevention Packaging Act of 1971 (PPPA). The purpose of the act was to insure that toxic but essential household products are not readily available to children. The act was passed because prior to the law, thousands of children needlessly suffered from poisoning by swallowing household medicines.

HOW ARE THE PACKAGES CHOSEN?

The Consumer Product Safety Commission (CPSC), the administration agency of the PPPA, determines whether or not a proposed safety cap meets federal standards. A safety cap will be approved only, if after a five minute test, 85% of a panel of 200 children fail to open the jar. The children are also given a silent demonstration on how to open the package. 80% must fail the second test. In addition, 90% of a panel of 100 adults must be able to open the package in a single five minute test.

In order to protect the elderly and the handicapped who are often unable to open child safety jars, the PPPA provides that each product may be sold in one size that does not comply with child resistant standards. The law requires however that non-complying containers bear a warning against use in homes with children and that at least one popular size be sold in the child safety package.

UNREGULATED PRODUCTS

There are a number of potentially dangerous products that are not covered under the law. The most obvious widely used are drain cleaners (including the new air pressure brands) oven cleaners, bleaches and floor waxes. Probably the best advice is to keep any dangerous product out of the reach of small children.

For more information about the law write to U.S Consumer Product Safety Commission, 1750 K Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20207

Spotlight On Director Nancy Haynes

by Joe Santana

The interview with Nancy Haynes is set for 1 o'clock. I arrive at the Royall Tyler five minutes late. Trying to find someone there is like trying to find someone in the Living and Learning Center. She's not in her office. Someone said, "try the costume shop." I do. In the costume shop, Miss Haynes is working with some cloth at the cutting table. I interrupt, "Excuse me Miss Haynes, sorry I'm late."

"Oh that's all right...Can we talk in here?"

"Sure"

She continues her work. I procede with mine.

"What type of play is Pride and Prejudice?

Pride and Prejudice is a romantic comedy...A romantic comedy with serious overtones as all comedies should have...It is comical because it has a happy ending...Because it deals with ordinary people and thrusts them into extraordinary situations...Romance is fun, charming...Pride and Prejudice is a wonderful contrast to Frustrate. Couldn't have picked two comedies less alike."

Why did you chose to adapt your own version of Jane Austen's novel, instead of using one of the other already existing adaptations?"

"Because other adaptations that were available were unsuitable for university casts and audiences...Too childish...Ninety per cent of the dialogue is from the book, this entailed a taking of the narrative line and turning it into a dramatic line...Some of the characters that are in the book, are not in my dramatized version...I could talk about it all day."

"Why are you doing Pride and Prejudice?

"I simply needed a play with women in it. The women students were getting tired of plays with too few roles for women. I always wanted to direct a romantic play because I hadn't directed a real love story in a long time...And of course the bicentennial was the deciding factor, since this year is the bicentennial celebration of Jane Austen's birth, as well as our own."

Peter Kurth and Nadine Maleski as Darcy and Elizabeth.

"What time is it?"

"Nearly 2 o'clock...We'd better get to wrapping this up soon. I have to teach a class in a few minutes."

Ok...Just a few more questions."

The answers. Bill Schenk's set is the first realistic as opposed to stylistic set to appear as of yet in the Royall Tyler Theatre...The music of the 19th century's most prominent composer, will be played live throughout the performance by Steven Freeman. Miss Haynes feels Chopin's music exemplifies the spirit of Pride and Prejudice...The costumes, designed by Miss Haynes with help from Lisa Devlin, are said to be romantic and elegant and will include authentic reproductions of two very famous military uniforms of the 1820's period, The Royal Horse Artilliary and the 73rd Foot's Famous "Red Coat."

Pride and Prejudice opens at the Royall Tyler Theatre on November 16th and will run through the 22nd. Tickets are available at the Royall Tyler box office.

Now...how do I get out of here!!!

Return To Forever: A Chat With Chick

by Wendy Pierro

Last Friday night before the fine Chick Corea concert, I sat in on a press conference with the Return to Forever Band. The band rapped to a group of people while eating a quick dinner of chicken and burgers.

Chick: Why don't we begin by first introducing ourselves?

Band: I'm Chick Corea, Al DiMeola, Lenny White and Stanley Clarke.

Question: A rumor from the Downbeat music poll states that Chick won composer and pianist of the year, and Lenny won bass player of the year. Is that rumor true?

Chick: The Downbeat Reader's Poll awards will be out in February, and telling you the results of that now would be blowing the excitement of it, if anybody is excited.

Question: What is the scientology that you're into, Chick?

Chick: It's an applied philosophy developed by an American, Ron Hubbard.

Question: Does it influence your music?

Chick: It doesn't directly, but personally I find scientology very valuable to help me get through life. It's a vast concept and the best way to understand it is to read a book on it.

Scientology is based on a traditional philosophy, that you are a spiritual being and not a body, and you can control your destiny by being aware and on top of things.

Question: How did you get together as a band?

Lenny: Four years ago I met Chick in a club in Philadelphia. We were playing with a jazz saxophone player called Joe Henderson. Chick had just left a group called Circle, and wanted to form a new band. Chick and I met, and it was kind of love at first sight type of thing. I like that cord... so Chick asked me to play with him and we've been together ever since. This is about the 3rd Return to Forever Band tha has been formed.

Question: Do you find it tough working out of the New York area?

Lenny: N.Y. City is the best place to be in the world. You don't want to live in Kansas.

Stanley: Yeah!

Al: N.Y. is a good place for an upcoming musician to get into recording and meet other musicians. There are loads and loads of agencies and recording studios, and there is a good chance of getting somewhere.

Stanley: N.Y. is the communication of the world.

Question: What does "Return to Forever" mean?

Chick: Well, it's an elongated version of RTF... laugh... I wrote my first piece of music and entitled it "Return to Forever." It's a poetic way of saying to cast off shit that gets in your way, and return to more of a self and feeling good. It's like the experience of when you're feeling really good and into something and you lose track of time: days could pass and you're just there doing it, poetically stated that's "forever." That's how people usually feel when they're very much themselves and doing creative things.

Question: Do you find time to do other things, besides traveling around and playing music?

Chick: We tour an awful lot, for the past two years it's been 10-11 months out of the year.

Stanley: Lenny's wife just had a baby.

Lenny: That's personal. I have a life with the band, and then I have my personal life.

Al: I have a cat.

Chick: I spend time with my family in Boston, but we haven't had that much time except to keep the group trip going.

Question: Do you like McDonald's food better or do you like Colonel Sander's Kentucky fried chicken?

Band: munch... munch... laugh... chicken's great.

Question: Al, would you like to talk about the new solo album a bit?

Al: I produced the album in N.Y., and it's going to be released on Columbia records in early January. Stanley played on one tune, Lenny played on another, Chick did a duet, Mingo Lewis played percussion on it and Barry Miles and Anthony Jackson also played on it. I wrote the majority of songs on it, except for a song written by Chick and another one written by Mingo. It was fun.

Chick: It's a lot different from other RTF albums. It shows more of an RTF influence, but not more jazz or funk, it's more coagulated, more happening, and it's hard to tell where it's coming from.

Question: How is Miles Davis like to play with?

Chick: I had a great experience working with Miles. I went through the gamut of working with him for three years, and being terrified of Miles for months because he was my idol and I was insecure at the time, and from there to have a very personal, warm, human relationship with the man. He had a good influence on me musically.

Question: What time do you think you will go on?

Chick: 9:00. We're going to play some material tonight that will be on our new album.

Question: Where did you just travel from?

Lenny: We just had a five day break. Our last gig was at Mount Holyoke College in Massachusetts. It was a great concert.

Question: Do you notice a difference in audiences?

Chick: It varies in what the area is like, and how well the people know us.

Question: Have you ever been afraid of an audience?

Chick: I used to not look at audiences. If you're afraid of something, one way to handle it is not to look at it, and then after awhile you forget that it's there, and you're not afraid of it anymore.

Question: Chick, did someone get you interested in jazz?

Chick: I kind of knew that I wanted to do it, my father was a jazz musician and I was brought up in this type of environment.

Question: Lenny, do you find it hard to play bass after eating chicken?

Lenny: It's slippery, definitely slippery, something nice about it...

Preservation Hall Jazz Band

New Orleans jazz, played by the musicians who helped to create this kind of music, will be heard on the Lane Series on Wednesday, November 19, 8 p.m. in Memorial Auditorium.

Preservation Hall Jazz Band, direct from New Orleans, will make their second appearance on the University's concert series, the first being in April of 1972, when the group played to a sold-out audience.

The concert is being sponsored by the Friends of the Lane Series as a benefit performance to raise funds for the Lane Series. Annually the Friends contribute in the vicinity of $15,000 to help the Lane Series bring quality artists to Burlington.

Each of the members of the Preservation Hall Jazz Bands has memories of the days when jazz, or "jass" as they spelled it at the turn of the century, was taking form and shape and becoming a separate kind of music. They were in the bands that marched to and from the cemetery for funerals, and they were in the wagons that drove up and down French Quarter streets and battled it out when two bands met at a corner. They were on the river boats, in the saloons and 'sporting houses' and dances. In fact, they were the people who added their names to Freddy Keppard, Buddy Bolden, Louis Armstrong, King Oliver and Jelly Roll Morton in the exciting history of an American art form that grew from many sources in the special culture that was New Orleans.

These are the people who made the history. But their vitality and youthful drive is still apparent in the singing, happy music of New Orleans and a concert today is full of the same spirit that made jazz the uninhibited music of the period around the first world war.

People from all over the world have made Preservation Hall at 726 St. Peter Street a priority on trips to New Orleans, it has become something like a pilgrimage. But the real pilgrims are the musicians who have been traveling the United States and the world to bring the true New Orleans jazz played by the people who have played it for 50 years in the Parishes around New Orleans. They know the music best, and they play it the way it was created.

New Orleans music is happy music, it is simple in technical terms, and complex in performance. It is not the straw hats and display of the "Dixieland" bands, nor is it the "Nicksieland" of New York. It won't cease to exist when these wonderful people are no longer with us, but it will never be the same because New Orleans Jazz is an attitude, a freedom of the spirit, and a memory of parades and dances and a good life. It is made up of years when a musician had to have the stamina to play several hours after another job on the docks or in the fields because he loved to play his horn.

The Preservation Hall Jazz Bands have been quietly taking their place among the leading American concert attractions for several years. Each year the tours get longer, the audiences get bigger and young and old Americans are finding a happy evening in a theatre or concert hall. The band members are not concerned with a message; they are bringing joy and sorrow in their stamps and blues. Feet aren't often still while the band is playing and the everlasting youth and vigor of the players leaps across the footlights into the hearts of everyone in the audience.

This year's Steering Committee of the Friends of the Lane Series is chairmanned by Eldon A. Decker, Jr., and Richard M. Jensen. Other members of the Committee are Mrs. Marilyn S. Alexander, Ben Bosher, Mrs. James A. Gould, Leon Lawrence, Barry W. Messinger, Mrs. John P. Tampas, J. Boone Wilson, and Bernard H. Zais. Mrs. Gould, Ben Bosher, Leon Lawrence, and Barry Messinger are former members of the Lane Committee.

The Friends of the Lane Series are also selling raffle tickets for the benefit of the Lane Series. The prize will be a pair of general admission tickets to all of this year's UVM hockey and basketball games – a total value of $100.

Tickets for the November 19 benefit performance of the Preservation Hall Jazz Band are $7.50 and $5.00, and are available in the Lane Office, 234 Waterman. For reservations, telephone 656-3418.

Billed as the "biggest cultural event of the year and possibly of the last decade," the Rolling Thunder Revue turned out to be all it was promised to be.

Bobby Newirth and his band, a collection of musicians from several bands, opened the show with a few fast numbers, including a song dedicated to Catfish Hunter. These numbers featured good instrumental backing, including a guitar solo by Mick Ronsen. Ronnie Blakley (from the movie Nashville and a Dylan protege) then joined the band for a short set featuring a piano solo. Bobby Newirth came back on stage to do a song he wrote for Janis Joplin, "Mercedes Benz."

Ramblin' Jack Elliott, acknamed "Woody Guthrie Junior," was the next performer. His solo set included "Muleskinner Blues" and "Friend of the Devil." After he did one more song with the Bobby Newirth Band the audience was ready for the star of the show.

Dylan, smiling and acknowledging the crowd immediately started playing "When I Paint My Masterpiece," a number which he has been opening his shows with since the start of the tour. He followed it with "It Ain't Me, Babe," which brought the crowd to its feet.

Dylan, who rarely speaks at a concert, dedicated "It's A Hard Rain Agonna Fall" to psychology students, saying "We're gonna do an old song a new way." Constantly in touch with the other members of the band and occasionally dancing around on stage, he appeared to be enjoying himself more on this tour than on his last tour a year and a half ago.

Billed as the "biggest cultural event of the year and possibly of the last decade," the Rolling Thunder Revue turned out to be all it was promised to be.

Ronnie Blakley (from the movie Nashville and a Dylan protege) then joined the band for a short set featuring a piano solo. Ramblin' Jack Elliott, acknamed "Woody Guthrie Junior," was the next performer. His solo set included "Muleskinner Blues" and "Friend of the Devil." After he did one more song with the Bobby Newirth Band, the audience was ready for the star of the show.

Dylan, smiling and acknowledging the crowd, immediately started playing "When I Paint My Masterpiece," a number which he has been opening his shows with since the start of the tour. He followed it with "It Ain't Me, Babe," which brought the crowd to its feet.

Dylan, who rarely speaks at a concert, dedicated "It's a Hard Rain Agonna Fall" to all psychology students, saying, "We're gonna do an old song a new way." Constantly in touch with the other members of the band and occasionally dancing around on stage, he appeared to be enjoying himself more on this tour than on his last tour a year and a half ago.

Dylan finished up the first half of the show with two new songs, "Durango" and "Ices." With a short "See you in fifteen minutes," Dylan and company disappeared backstage.

When the second set opened, guitars could be heard behind the curtain. The curtain rose, revealing a tee-shirt clad Dylan and a barefoot Baez, singing, "The Times They Are a Changin'." The king and queen of folk music warmed up with "Never Let Me Go" and "Daddy You're Just On My Mind." They then dedicated "I Dreamed I Saw St. Augustine" to Lowell, Massachusetts, the scene of their best concert so far on the tour. Baez, arm around Dylan, joined him for the last number of their set "I Shall Be Released."

Baez, totally at home on the stage, opened her solo set with "Diamonds and Rust," a song she wrote about Dylan when he returned to the stage last year after an eight year absence. She then displayed the remarkable range and power of her voice with an acappella rendition of "Sweet Chariot." The crowd was silenced as she sang "Jesse" and "Joe Hill." She was joined by the band as she closed her set with "Long Black Veil," a song by The Band, and "Please Come to Boston."

Special guest Roger McGuin played his recent hit, "Chestnut Mare," and accompanied Baez on "The Night They Drove Old Dixie Down."

Dylan came back out for a solo set accompanying himself with guitar and harmonica in his usual fashion. He opened with "Simple Twist of Fate" and "Oh Sister," a new song. "Carter," the story of an unjustly imprisoned black man, and "One More Cup of Coffee" followed. Dylan closed his set with perhaps the best song of the night, "Sarah," and an oldie "Just Like a Woman."

The band and Roger McGuin joined Dylan for "Knockin' on Heaven's Door" to end the concert.

A standing ovation brought everyone out for an encore of "This Land is Your Land," a Woody Guthrie tune. It was fitting for a Woody Guthrie song to end the night since he was a common bond for all of those on stage in their early years in Greenwich Village.

Special thanks should be given to those students who organized the waiting line so that Wednesday's mob scene was not repeated. Perhaps UVM security can learn a lesson on crowd control from them so that concerts may be organized in the future.

Space Odyssey:

A Concert Filled Weekend

by Paul Prior

A wild weekend indeed, but then again – life is like a beanstalk, isn't it. To say that Burlington saw an extreme increase in Concert Activity would be not only gross, but also a gross understatement. As a matter of fact, it was just so incredible, that I thought I'd let all you fabulous readers have a tiny peak at my diary entering for the weekend. Remember, just a peek.

Friday, November 7th

Dear Diary:

I mean gosh and geewhizkowilikers!! You'll never believe what happened to me tonight!! I met a real live star, actually a cluster of stars – Chick Corea and the Return for Deposit, I mean Return to Forever. My friend and I spent time in the Same Room with these, these, ROCK STARS!! I mean, well, how can you put it into words??

"Easy," he said, "Easy with that chicken Stanley – It's mean!" Quiet spoken Al Dimeola, just a young whippersnapper from Bergenfield smiled as he and his cohorts wolfed down some real fine lookin' Colonel Sander's Kentucky Fried.

"Chick, this question's for you – What's your sign?"

"Stanley, do you find that eating fried chicken improves your bass playing?"

"Is that Lenny White behind those Foster Grants?"

"Oh, I get it – it's a press conference!"

Sorry folks, don't know what overcame me – Must have been all the excitement of being in the same room as some WRUV and WWPV radio personalities. The concert at Memorial Auditorium Friday evening was exceptional. The first half had its ups and downs. I've seen Chick and the boys three times in the period of less than a year. Middlebury last November, Central Park this past August, and Burlington this weekend. This concert was the best by far. Opening with material primarily from their album Where Have I Known You Before, the band played a tight electric opening set, but there was just a little bit missing. From chatting to them before, I learned that they had taken a five-day break from a rigorous touring schedule. Who knows, maybe the five day break made the second half of the show as good as it was – Nothing short of brilliant. Some images:

Stanley Clark – Hitting rock-bottom notes on his acoustic monster bass, his head bobbing back and forth, making eye contact with the others in the band – Much akin to watching somebody else watching a tennis match.

Lenny White – The Demon Drummer from Hell, in sunglasses yet. His co-ordination of bass, drum, snare, and high-hat are unmatched. His solo was interesting throughout, with many people expecting him to have a heart attack midway through it.

Al Dimeola – He looked so bored and un-phased by the crowd and band, at first I thought he was a candidate for the morgue. His acoustic solo was so fine that Memorial Auditorium went temporarily berserk.

Chick Corea – He plays piano and keyboards like no one else, and smiling, opening and closing his mouth with every note. His 'Uke' solo toward the end of the evening was the finest bit of showmanship seen in Burlington in some time.

In all, a very good show that gave each of the performers a chance to open up, and really shine on his own. They're funky but they're clean!

Saturday, November 8th

Diary, last night was so amazing I didn't think anything would ever be able to equal it – or even come close. The acoustics of Patrick Gym usually aren't too hot, while the gym is the exact opposite.

Joan Baez Photo by Mark Shane

So, with this in mind, I and 5500 other crazies squeezed and sleazed into the gym for the Rolling Thunder Revue. As loyal readers of this column will remember, last week contained a right put down of the hype and tripe that went down before the show was even officially announced. I still stand by what I said, though perhaps I was a bit harsh on Mr. Dylan's singing ability. He was very impressive live, but for this reviewer (and you fabulous readers must realize this is one opinion) the concert was professional, there were some high and not so high points to it. I didn't feel it was one of the best concerts I've ever seen though, no matter who was headlining. I was impressed by the band assembled by Dylan, certainly one of the tighter groups to hit B-Town in ages. Bobby Newirth was extremely amiable as a kind of M.C. There were some excellent guitar licks from Mr. Mick Ronson, formerly of Bowie and Mott fame. Roger McGuin was quite good. Too bad he played only one song as "leader." "Chestnut Mare." Joan Baez was incredible in her acappella version of "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot." Her duet with Dylan on "I Shall Be Released" was one of the high points for me, as well as Dylan's solo spot. His phrasing, his presence, the whole Dylan aura hit me completely when he was alone on stage. His versions of the oldies were good, in some cases better than the original. I especially dug "Just Like A Woman." "Hurricane Carter" was the stand-out for me as far as the new material went. Aside from a few moments though, I was left with the nagging feeling that it was a little too calculated, a little too rehearsed. This word "professionalism" keeps getting bandied about. Yeah, it was professional. But the reason it seemed that way is because we see so little of it in Burlington. We have good concerts occasionally, with Rolling Thunder being one of the best this town has seen. But when I go to a concert as hyped up as this one was, I expect chills down the spine and rushes to the brain. And on Saturday night, they just didn't happen. Maybe they would have happened if Dylan had played more solo stuff. I really don't know. For the majority of the people who went, the concensus was that it was A-1 and the best. I expect a lot of jive on this column, and readers are more than welcome to reply or write a column of their own. Maybe the times are really changing after all...

An Evening With The New Riders

by Mark Rheault

Last Friday night, the lights dimmed on schedule in the Patrick Gym. The New Riders were back in Burlington and 3,200 people were brought to their feet by the ever popular song, Panama Red. Unfortunately by playing their most popular song first the crowds expectations rose to a higher level than the New Riders could deliver. This resulted in a growing restlessness during the first hour. It seemed that no matter what the New Riders did they could not inspire the crowd back to their earlier level of enthusiasm.

After some fresh air and a welcome intermission the crowd was ready to see if the New Riders could still deliver the energy they are known for. They lived up to the crowds expectations and for the last hour and a half kept a large part of the audience on their feet. The old favorites such as Glendale Train, Henry, L.A. Cowboy and an excellent jam of Portland Woman were received much better than their newer and less familiar songs. By twenty of twelve the energy reached its peak and a 2½ hour evening with the New Riders was over. The crowd was large enough to enable SA concerts to break even and this will ensure more concerts during the year.

Love And Sex In Literature

by Elizabeth Hyde

Elizabeth Hardwick, professor of English at Smith College and noted essayist, spoke at UVM last Wednesday on "Love and Sex in Recent American Literature." The second of four in the English Department's Distinguished Lecture Series, Hardwick is the author of several novels and critical anthologies, among them Seduction and Betrayal, A View of My Own, and The Ghostly Lover.

Drawing comparisons with historical classics such as Anna Karenina and Madame Bovary, Hardwick depicted a general lack of characterization in many contemporary love-sex-oriented novels. The literary essence of sex today lies in its repetition, she contended. Referring to Fear of Flying as a "plot of numbers," Hardwick noted that Isadora Wing's desires not to exploit the man she was having an affair with -- a getting-even approach -- but rather to cash him in for endless fornication.

I agree with her that the zipless fuck does connote an arithmetical progression of orgasms. I am also skeptical of elevating Isadora's character above a logical succession of mad housewives and ex-prom queens. However, the novel's success lay in the fact that our formal introduction to the zipless fuck was long overdue, and the introspective, analytical nature of the novel makes it more than just a plot of numbers.

If Hardwick's lecture fell flat it certainly was not due to her composure as a speaker. She had a breathiness about her that manifested itself in spontaneity and humor, and it was a pleasure to hear and watch her. What disappointed me -- and maybe I am expecting too much from this Distinguished Lecture Series was that she did not give herself enough credit where credit was due. I had the opportunity of reading beforehand two of her essays, one a general critique of Sylvia Plath, the other a review of Simone deBeauvoir's The Second Sex. The article on Plath demonstrated an acute insight into the world of this poet, a world filled with the hurt, the damage, the fury, and finally the suicide of an overambitious woman. The review of The Second Sex was so brilliantly written that it was almost on the same intellectual plane as de Beauvoir's work itself. In this article, Hardwick's analysis went far beyond the usual feministic train of thought. DeBeauvoir rebels against the fact that women must put up with the dirty work. But Hardwick points out deBeauvoir's failure to recognize that "Men, also, are doomed to work of brutalizing monotony." Granted, women have had it bad. But are the 9-5 commuters really to be envied?

To return to the lecture: after reading these articles, I was looking forward to a lecture that would keep me on the edge of my seat and chewing my nails, as her articles had done. But it seemed as if she barely touched the surface of her topic. She quoted from many novels, and for this I do not doubt that her own thought processes were in overdrive -- but she didn't seem to want to share it all with the audience. Her discussion of Judith Rossner's Looking For Mr. Goodbar hardly went beyond a synopsis of the novel. Having read it this summer, I was curious to know how a critic such as Elizabeth Hardwick would have judged its merits. I admired Rossner's style and felt that she skillfully handled what could have been a dead-end piece of pornography. A true incident, the story concerns a young woman's progression from a unification of sex with love to a total divorcing of the two. She reaches a point where she can have sex with someone she dislikes, but not with a man she loves -- a situation analogous to those days when the boy could screw the class whore but not his steady date. Hardwick, referring to the woman as "our Emma Bovary of the Month," summed the work up as a novel "about getting laid." I wanted more, but she turned too soon to John Updike and too soon again to Nabokov, and suddenly the lecture was over without her having gone into depth in any one source.

I don't want to impose any unreasonable standards upon a speaker, but I felt that she had limited her discussion to a rather elementary level. Perhaps she prefers to confine her intellectualizing to the written word, keeping her lectures on an entertaining, more spontaneous level. And that is how her lecture came off: it was entertaining, spontaneous, and witty -- but zipless.

Terror At Tyler

by Jose Santana

TRUE!--nervous--very, very dreadfully nervous I had been and am; but why do you say that I am mad? The disease has sharpened my senses--not destroyed--not dulled them. Above all, the sense of hearing was acute. I heard all things in the heaven and in the earth. I heard many things in hell. How, then, am I mad? Hearken! and observe how healthily--how calmly I can tell you the whole story.

So it will begin. Tomorrow at four, in the Royall Tyler Theatre, Craig Purinton, in his dramatization of Edgar Allen Poe's The Tell-Tale Heart.

"In his short stories, Poe took the subject of madness one step further than other authors. He wrote of the mind's capacity to observe its own deterioration which is much more horrifying...I've been interested in doing this since I've been interested in theatre...Ever since high school," said Purinton.

Purinton, a December graduate of the Theatre Department, will also do readings of four of Poe's poems: To Helen, For Lane, Lenore, and Annabel Lee.

Admission is free, tomorrow at 4 o'clock in the Royall Tyler Theatre.

Wind Ensemble

The 1975 Interstate Symphonic Wind Ensemble, composed of outstanding high school instrumentalists from Vermont, New Hampshire, and northeastern New York, will be presenting its eleventh annual concert on Sunday, November 16 at 3:00 p.m. in the University of Vermont Ira Allen Chapel.

This year the Wind ensemble will be conducted by Mr. James Herbert, Director of Bands at Temple University in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. In addition to holding degrees from the University of Nebraska, Manhattan School of Music, and Columbia University, Mr. Herbert has performed with name bands, including Paul Lavalle's "Cities Service Band of America, Fred Waring's Pennsylvanians, (playing solo trombone), and has performed with various New York symphonic ensembles, Broadway show orchestras, and radio-television recording orchestras. Mr. Herbert has also been president of the Pennsylvania Collegiate Bandmasters' Association and a former member of the Board of Governors of the Pennsylvania Music in Higher Education Association and is currently active as a guest conductor and adjudicator throughout the Eastern United States. Chosen by the School Musician Magazine as one of America's ten most outstanding music educators for 1975-76, Mr. Herbert was also selected for inclusion in the 1975 International Who's Who in Music. Mr. Herbert is also active in many musical and honorary fraternities, as well as being active in the Music Educators National Conference.

This performance will climax a weekend of rehearsals, clinics, and other activities, during which the students will have been housed in private homes through the generosity of members of the community.

The concert is free and the public is cordially invited to attend."

Charlie Brown A Joyous Occasion

by Martha Hess

Thursday, November 6th, marked the transformation of Billings from a student center into a student theatre with the opening of You're A Good Man Charlie Brown. Sponsored by the Billings Center Government Board, the all-student production was a success, drawing capacity audiences every evening through Novgmber 9th.

A refreshing departure from Royall Tyler Theatre, the apse at Billings is well-suited to intimate theatre. Its proportions allow the audience, seated on the floor and the balcony, to feel closer to the players, more involved in the action of the play itself. Such an effect is especially appropriate for last week's offering. The play, based on the comic strip characters created by Charles Schultz, is so appealing to all ages, and its characters so obviously stereotypical, that it evokes feelings of empathy from every member of the audience. The antics of Schultz' youthful characters and their completely understandable foibles recall to the viewer his own childhood memories, and, as a result, a rare rapport is established between the actors and the audience.

The quality of the play itself was enhanced by the quality of the fine performances given Thursday night. Kevin Meconi, playing the lead character, conveyed well Charlie Brown's lack of confidence, insecurity, clumsiness -- in a word, Meconi was a real loser, if only for the evening's performance. Falling even to keep a kite in the sky, he was, in the words of his character, "thoroughly, totally, utterly blah" and should be commended for his ability to portray so convincingly such a charming non-entity as Charlie Brown.

Sari Bodi was a perfect bitch, as Lucy Van Pelt, of course. "Spreading crabbiness" everywhere she went, she irritated the audience with her high-pitched voice, tactless remarks, and ill-placed advice. Sari did an especially good job with Lucy's pompous mannerisms in a segment depicting her desire to own a queendom. Yes, Lucy was willing to buy her queendom since her perceptive brother, Linus, pointed out that "queen" is an inherited title.

As Linus, Lucy's little brother, Jon Bourne did an excellent job portraying an outwardly immature character dependent on a security blanket but with the mind of an intellectual. Doing a tango with his blanket, he especially charmed the audience with his musical number "Me and My Blanket."

Another show-stopper was Peter DeLorenzo as Snoopy, displaying that irrepressible canine's delusions of grandeur in an endearing light. DeLorenzo showed his ability to act a number of roles, for he not only portrayed Snoopy, but Snoopy's fantasy lives as well, including a WW I flying ace and "Joe Cool at the local student union checkin' out all the pretty chicks." Most entertaining however, was his song and dance routine, "Suppertime." Describing the glories of his evening meal, he delighted the audience with his singing and tap-dancing. When Charlie Brown berates him for making a theatrical production out of a simple meal, Snoopy answers with typical nonchalance, "So what's wrong with making mealtime a joyous occasion?"

If suppertime wasn't, at least Charlie Brown was a joyous occasion for all involved, cast, crew, and audience.

Hail Hynkel! The Great Dictator

Charlie Chaplin As Adenoid Hynkel

Charlie Chaplin's satiric view of Adolph Hitler, as seen in the movie The Great Dictator, will be shown on Friday, November 14, at both 7:30 p.m. and 9:30 p.m., in Marsh Life Sciences Building Auditorium.

The movie is the fifth film in the Charlie Chaplin Classic Movie Series presented by the Lane Film Society of the University of Vermont.

For The Great Dictator, (1940), Chaplin's first dialogue film, he created two new characters, a meek Jewish barber who is something of an extention of the tramp, and Adenoid Hynkel, a lampoon of Adolph Hitler. The whole project was considered a daring risk at the time, but audiences loved it and, although banned in several countries (and not just the obvious ones), it quickly became the most popular success Chaplin had yet experienced.

In subsequent years The Great Dictator has come in for some criticism from those who feel that the horrors of Nazi Germany are beyond the realm of comedy. At the time it was Chaplin's conviction that Hitler and his regime must be made to look ridiculous; that laughter could be used as a potent weapon. In this film, a sometimes clashing mixture of deft satire and broad burlesque, he accomplished his purpose. It is doubtful that anyone once having seen it could subsequently view newsreel footage of Der Fuhrer and his goose-stepping minions in any but a much altered context. However, in his autobiography, published in 1964, Chaplin admits that, had he known the true nightmares of the Nazi concentration camps, he could not have brought himself to make The Great Dictator.

Another controversy, this one of a more aesthetic nature, has long surrounded the closing minutes of the film. It is here that Chaplin steps completely out of character and delivers, directly to the audience, an impassioned speech on man's inhumanity to man. Some find it a moment of daring inspiration; others find it ludicrous. In context of the time of the film's original release audiences found here a moving articulation of their most fervent hopes. The speech was widely circulated in print and Chaplin was twice called upon to repeat it on network radio broadcasts.

The movie was written, produced and directed by Chaplin. Appearing with him in the film are Paulette Goddard, Jack Oakie, Reginald Gardiner, Henry Daniell and Billy Gilbert.

Tickets, $1.00 each, are available in the Lane Office, 234 Waterman, and at the door on the night of the showing. For reservation, telephone 656-3418.

The final movie in the Chaplin series is the immortal Limelight, November 21.

1 You can sometimes control the direction of the ball by where it hits your paddle. If it hits the center it will go straight. If it hits the right edge, it will go right, etc. Hicking the paddle to get a spin might work but is less controlled.

2 Avoid the sharp angle shots since they tend to slow the ball and are easy to return. The most effective angle shots are those that rebound closest to your opponent, the deadliest being the shot that rebounds just as it hits his line of play.

3 Shots down the middle are boring and slow. However, late in the rally after the ball has speeded up, a middle shot can be a killer if used deliberately to surprise your opponent.

Dr. Lattie F. Coor, vice chancellor of Washington University of St. Louis, Mo., has been named 21st president of the University of Vermont.

The University Board of Trustees Friday announced his selection as president of the state and land-grant university, to become effective July 1 or such earlier date as shall be fixed by the Board.

He succeeds Dr. Edward C. Andrews, Jr., who left the UVM presidency last July to become head of the Maine Medical Center in Portland, Maine. Since then, Dr. Wayne C. Patterson has served as interim president of the University.

Dr. Coor's selection here today culminates a search which began last February with the appointment of a 12-member committee presenting trustees, faculty, students, staff and alumni, and chaired by Trustee Robert Boardman of Burlington.

Dr. Coor holds the A.B. with high honors from Northern Arizona University, and the M.A. with honors and the Ph.D., both in political science, from Washington University.

Dr. Coor began teaching at Washington University in 1958, and in 1963 was named assistant to the chancellor. In 1967 he became assistant dean, Graduate School of Arts and Sciences, a post he filled while concurrently serving as director of international studies. From 1969 to 1974 he was vice chancellor of Washington University, and has served as university vice chancellor since 1974.

He has been a consultant to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare and the National Center for Higher Education Management Systems.

(CPS)--If a person should ever feel a whole life of possibilities stretching before him, it is during his days as a college student. For many students, college days are a time of independence and freedom unlike any before or after, and the college degree, while no longer a promise of success, still means a good chance of it.

But every year, at least 25 students find college life or life in general so intolerable that they take their own lives. At least 750 others try. And the rate of student suicides, the second largest killer of students after accidents, has increased sharply during the past decade and a half.

One Colorado psychiatrist believes the suicide rate correlates with events on campus, and the quieter the campus is, the worse. "When the campus is quiet -- people less involved in external causes -- you become more introspective, more involved in taking a look at yourself," he explained.

Other psychologists and social workers find reasons for suicide which exist on every campus every day. The director of the Mental Health Center at Iowa State University blames student suicides in part on the inherent loneliness of campuses. "The university student population is a high risk group (than average)," he said. "A large university can tend to be pretty impersonal. You can be isolated emotionally in the very midst of it."

A doctor at the Harvard University Health Service noticed that students often become depressed through out their last year of college because they haven't decided what they want to do after graduation. The same doctor also blamed modern society's approval of impulsive acts and "buy now and pay later" mentality for student suicides.

Phyllis Miller, a staff psychologist at the Iowa State University counselling center, believes that suicidal tendencies become more pronounced at certain times of the year. "Depression winter quarter is epidemic," she said, "especially after Christmas until the end of February."

Coor Named New UVM President

Dr. Lattie F. Coor, vice chancellor of Washington University of St. Louis, Mo., has been named 21st president of the University of Vermont.

The University Board of Trustees Friday announced his selection as president of the state and land-grant university, to become effective July 1 or such earlier date as shall be fixed by the Board.

He succeeds Dr. Edward C. Andrews, Jr., who left the UVM presidency last July to become head of the Maine Medical Center in Portland, Maine. Since then, Dr. Wayne C. Patterson has served as interim president of the University.

Dr. Coor's selection here today culminates a search which began last February with the appointment of a 12-member committee, presenting trustees, faculty, students, staff and alumni, and chaired by Trustee Robert Boardman of Burlington.

Dr. Coor holds the A.B. with high honors from Northern Arizona University, and the M.A. with honors and the Ph.D., both in political science, from Washington University.

Dr. Coor began teaching at Washington University in 1958, and in 1963 was named assistant to the chancellor. In 1967 he became assistant dean, Graduate School of Arts and Sciences, a post he filled while concurrently serving as director of international studies. From 1969 to 1974 he was vice chancellor of Washington University, and has served as university vice chancellor since 1974.

He has been a consultant to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare and the National Center for Higher Education Management Systems.

Dr. Coor has published widely, and his current professional memberships include service to the Association of American Universities, the American Council on Education, the National Center for Higher Education Management Systems at WICHE (Western Interstate Commission for Higher Education), and others.

Dr. Coor was born in Phoenix, Arizona in 1936. He is married, and resides with his wife and three children in St. Louis, Mo.

He is 21st in a succession of University of Vermont presidents which began with the Rev. Daniel Clarke Sanders, D.D., in 1800. Rev. Sanders served for 14 years.

The University currently enrolls about 7200 undergraduates in the Colleges of Agriculture; Arts and Sciences; Education and Social Services; Engineering, Mathematics and Business Administration; and in the Schools of Allied Health Sciences, Home Economics, Natural Resources, and Nursing.

With Graduate College, Medical College, and non-degree students, total enrollment at Vermont is some 9,000. The University's current operating budget is approximately $55 million, and the campus plant is valued at some $115 million.

Allen Q. Eaton of Winchester, Mass., chairman of the Board of Trustees, had praise for the selection committee, and for Dr. Patterson, who will continue as interim President until the new president comes aboard. Dr. Patterson had made clear he did not wish to be considered as a candidate for the presidency.

"On behalf of the Board of Trustees," Mr. Eaton said, "I would like to pay tribute to the search committee which dedicated so much time and talent to the search process. More than 250 individuals were nominated or applied for the UVM presidency and the richness, diversity, and caliber of the candidates is reflected in the seven men who were invited to campus to meet a representative cross section of faculty, staff and students."

Saying he knew the new president could count on support of the University and its community of alumni and other friends, he asked for continuing support for Dr. Patterson as the interim process moves toward the arrival of the new president.

Members of the search committee, in addition to Mr. Boardman, included Professors Norman Alpert, Samuel Bogorad, Donald Moser and Robert Sinclair; Trustees Joseph Corbett, Paul Low and Louise Swainbank; students Tina Heck, '76, and David Schwartz, '77; Alumni Council President Richard Wolfe; and Selma Bloomberg, associate director of the Office of Academic Support. Dr. John Moore, assistant academic vice president, and Mrs. Wendy Smith, administrative assistant in the president's office, served as staff liaison for the search committee.

School Study Compares Sexes

(CPS) -- Boys and girls understand major school subjects equally well -- until about age 13. But at 13, girls begin to decline in educational achievement and this continues into adulthood.

Research conducted by the National Assessment of Educational Progress shows that of eight major learning areas, males generally do better in four subjects: math, science, social studies and citizenship. Girls were shown to have a slight edge in music that carries over to later years and consistently out-perform males in writing.

But in reading and literature, where girls excel at age 9, they fall behind males by the time they reach the ages of 26-35.

Figures for the government-financed study were tabulated from analysis of tests given to 900,000 students and young adults in the U.S. The Denver-based National Assessment claims that it is a "strictly census like, data gathering organization." But the organization did offer some explanation for the difference in educational ability of the sexes.

In reading, where girls outstrip boys until age 17, the report's authors speculate that the reason may be the jobs women get later in life. "Since the majority of higher level jobs -- where reading is an important and frequently used skill -- belong to men, women generally do not have the opportunity to employ reading skills that men do," the report states.

In science tests, where boys out-performed girls, the authors guessed that the differences might be because high school science courses are generally electives. Boys choose science courses more often than girls, the auth[illegible] state, giving them a b[illegible] knowledge of physical sciences.

The report also says that the differences in the sexes' performance on math tests was "overwhelming." Girls keep up until age 9, but lag later in measurment exercises and geometry. While girls did well at reading and pure computation, the researchers were surprised that males did better at household buying problems, such as determining the lowest price per ounce for a box of rice.

Study Director Dr. Roy Forbes said the results reflect "subtle and not so subtle forces -- both within the education system and society in general -- that affect female education achievement."

The report was blasted by a Denver congresswoman though, who criticized the report for failing to make it clear why girls score lower than boys and for not pointing out more carefully that the figures are for achievement and not aptitude.

Rep. Patricia Schroeder (D-CO) claimed that it wasn't surprising girls scored lower on social studies tests "when they're repeatedly told that having 21-year-old hands at 30 is the real goal to be attained."

It is no surprise that women's minds stagnate, she said, when they "are immersed in the mind-mirring tasks of daily home drudgery."

Bulb Causes Fire

by John McDonald

On Tuesday, November 11, at 2:00 p.m. the Burlington Fire Department rushed to the scene of an "almost" fire. The scene was Lafayette Hall, the cause of the fire, a flourescent light bulb.

Students left the building and waited for the verdict from Deputy Chief Richard Trombley. When asked about the nature of the fire he answered, "It was just a small electrical fire and was pretty much put out before we got here. It could have turned into something dangerous because it was extinguished with water. It's bad practice to use water on electrical fires. The water can act as a conductor of the electrical current."

Deputy Chief Trombley described the fire procedure as "routine." Everything was under control within five to ten minutes. If nothing else it was a little excitement for a sunny afternoon. The firemen got some action and the students got a much needed break from the classroom.

Student Suicides On The Rise

by Cynthia Crossen

(CPS)--If a person should ever feel a whole life of possibilities stretching before him, it is during his days as a college student. For many students, college days are a time of independence and freedom unlike any before or after, and the college degree, while no longer a promise of success, still means a good chance of it.

But every year, at least 250 students find college life or life in general so intolerable that they take their own lives. At least 750 others try. And the rate of student suicides, the second largest killer of students after accidents, has increased sharply during the past decade and a half.

One Colorado psychiatrist believes the suicide rate correlates with events on campus, and the quieter the campus is, the worse. "When the campus is quiet -- people less involved in external causes -- you become more introspective, more involved in taking a look at yourself," he explained.

Other psychologists and social workers find reasons for suicide which exist on every campus every day. The director of the Mental Health Center at Iowa State University blamed student suicides in part on the inherent loneliness of big campuses. "The university student population is a higher risk group (than average)," he said. "A large university can tend to be pretty impersonal. You can be isolated emotionally in the very midst of it."

A doctor at the Harvard University Health Service noticed that students often become depressed throughout their last year of college because they haven't decided what they want to do after graduation. The same doctor also blamed modern society's approval of impulsive acts, the "buy now and pay later" mentality, for student suicides.

Phyllis Miller, a staff person at the Iowa State University counselling center, believes that suicidal tendencies become more pronounced at certain times of year. "Depression winter quarter is epidemic," she said, "especially after Christmas until the end of February."

And depression seems to hit the freshman class harder than others, Miller said, because of academic pressures. "They come here after having been at the top of their class, only to find out that everyone else is also class valedictorian and president of the student council. They find out they're just normal."

A spokeswoman for the Center for Studies of Suicide Prevention agrees that "identity is among the basic causes of suicide among college individuals. The student is often away from home for the first time, faces new and difficult academic challenges and is thrust into a social whirl he never experienced in high school," she explained.

The person who commits suicide is never readily identifiable beforehand. Statistically, more women try but more men succeed, college students are more likely to commit suicide than their non-college peers, and suicidal students usually get good grades but never feel quite secure about them. After that, there are only individual cases of marital or dating problems, loneliness, guilt because of college rebelliousness and the necessity to adjust to a whole new community.

To deal with potential student suicides, many communities and colleges have organized prevention centers with around-the-clock phone counsellors. But as Newsweek magazine pointed out, there has been no "demonstrable success anywhere in lowering the suicide rate." Most psychologists attribute this to the fact that people who have already decided to commit suicide would not call prevention centers.

But another explanation may be possible in light of a new attitude toward suicides. A counsellor at a suicide prevention center in Iowa said their policy was not "to talk people out of suicide. People have the right to life or non-life. If it helps them to have someone to talk to, then that's what we're here for."

Suicide may be a special problem of college because it is often the first time students have to be realistic about their futures. "College is a ruthless gardener," a social worker at UCLA said. "When a student realizes that his dreams may not bear fruit, that he can't be a great writer, lawyer, doctor or accomplish great social change, then there is a sudden sense of failure, a stressful fear of disappointing one's parents."

Humanitarian Aid To Vietnam Illegal?

A vigilance committee gathered in front of the Federal building in Burlington, Vermont, at 12:30 on Nov. 10, Monday, to join the AFSC in its plans to send unlicensed humanitarian aid to North and South Vietnam. Disapproval of licenses by the U.S. government makes the AFSC's action illegal.

The Treasury Department has denied AFSC's license applications to send fishnets and agricultural implements, including rototillers, to South Vietnam in addition to wood screw-making machines for use by war-handicapped persons in a cooperative workshop located in an area carpet bombed in Hanoi, North Vietnam.

In Burlington, as in many cities nationwide, including Washington D.C., participants submitted copies of forms through which they joined the AFSC's determination to send the unlicensed humanitarian aid to North and South Vietnam -- by making a donation for purchase of the items. The fishnets, agricultural implements and screw-making machines will be sent as soon as purchases are completed and shipping arrangements made final.

"Now, after the hostilities are over, 'humanitarian' seems to have a narrower meaning than during the war," AFSC Board Chairman Wallace Collett said in Congressional testimony in September.

AFSC Executive Secretary Louis Schneider has declared that "The arbitrary license denial by the administration symbolizes the whole of U.S. postwar attitudes to Indochina. Instead of following the long American tradition of aiding in the reconstruction of war-damaged countries, and of reconciliation with past foes, this Administration has taken another course."

The action in Burlington was coordinated by the Burlington Area's Friends of AFSC and the Burlington Friends Meeting. AFSC Field Secretary for Vermont, Liz Yeats, said today, "I have already received many forms of complicity and checks from people who could not be with us today. I am pleased that so many Vermonters feel a strong personal commitment to provide humanitarian aid to the Vietnamese."

The AFSC has given over $2 million to civilian victims of the Vietnamese war for various projects since 1966. The Quaker group's action today was labeled an "Act for Friendship with Vietnam."

This action, as well as a campaign to provide yarn and sweaters to children in Vietnam is part of AFSC's participation in Friendship ment, a new national coalition of religious, civic, and peace organizations campaigning for private and governmental aid to Indochina.

Project Break - Through

As the current semester has reached a half-way point, the members of "Project Break-Through," a Living/Learning Center-based student advocacy effort to promote barrier-free environments for the disabled, wishes to inform the campus community about what's happening at home base, and what we are planning from here. Any persons with an interest in this problem and our efforts are invited to attend an informal discussion with Mayor Gordon Paquette tonight, October 30th, at 7:00 in the Living/Learning Center fireplace lounge. The mayor has shown concern and an interest in the problems faced by the handicapped by experiencing the types of barriers encountered by disabled persons during a day spent traveling the downtown Burlington area in the confines of a wheelchair. He has also promoted handicapped legislation on a federal level and is working in cooperation with others in an effort to reduce architectural barriers in the Burlington vicinity. He will elaborate upon his interests, ideas, and actions and consider those of others. We hope you will come with questions. Following that, members of our program will summarize our efforts and actions already taken, and will attempt to relate them to the organized efforts of individuals and organizations in the community. In other words, we feel that the efforts of each group and individual would be more effective in attaining a barrier-free environment if they were coordinated and integrated into a larger universal group.

To be more explicit, "Project Break-Through" is an advocacy effort aimed at identifying and reducing attitudinal and environmental barriers which preclude full participation by disabled persons in campus and community life. In an initial proposal of our program to the Living/Learning Center, we stated objectives which we are presently aiming to achieve. One of these objectives is to foster community awareness, interest, and understanding of the problems being encountered by disabled persons. This includes individuals with impairment of intellectual functioning and emotional behavioral adjustment, as well as those with the more obvious physical handicaps. We hope that you can share the task of achieving this objective with us. We have already enlisted the active support of community organizations and service agencies in maximizing opportunities for disabled persons to participate fully in their local community. With this starting point and the public's growing awareness and support, our task can and will be accomplished.

Beware Of The FBI

by Bruce Toifer

The appearance of the Boston Grand Jury Project in Burlington last Saturday highlighted an increasingly hot issue: the abuse of the grand jury system by the executive branch. Originally intended as a buffer between the people and the prosecution, the Nixon-Mitchell Justice Department transformed them into an intelligence-gathering arm of the FBI in their never-ending attempts to infiltrate the radical left. "Special Grand Jury" has become synonymous with harrassment and fear of imprisonment without trial. Small wonder that the Federal prosecutors, working openly with the FBI, gained the power to call unlimited witnesses to an unlimited number of grand juries anywhere in the country with virtually no check on the areas of concern. A witness enters the chamber alone; defence counsel is not allowed. The witness need not be told the crime under investigation nor whether he or she is a potential defendent. A grant of immunity is no guarantee against later prosecution; indeed, the witness' own testimony can be used against him/her. Refusal to testify, on the other hand, carries a jail sentence of up to eighteen months, and, upon release, a recalcitrant witness may be re-subpoenaed, asked the same questions, and jailed again for refusal. This could continue forever, becoming a nightmare of endless periods of eighteen months imprisonment.

The questions themselves veer far from the inquiry at hand and are often personal in nature, e.g., "Who was sleeping with whom and in what rooms?" A typical question went as follows: "I want you to describe for the jury every occasion during the year 1970 when you have been in contact with, attended meetings that were conducted by, or been any place where any individual spoke whom you knew to be associated with or affiliated with the SDS, the Weathermen, the Communist Party, or any organization advocating the overthrow of the United States, describing for the grand jury when the incidents occurred, who was present, and what was said by all members present there, and what you did at the times you were in those meetings, groups, associations, or conversations?" Other questions deal with modes of transportation, friendships, finances, habits and life-style in general. Of mere witnesses? And in the case stated above, after the target of the investigation had been indicted! The "why" of it is chillingly sinister. Any name or place or any bit of trivia that a witness in front of one of these political fishing trips says is then fed into the Internal Security Division of the Justice Department's data bank along with all their other sources of intelligence, including illegal electronic surveilance and letter-opening, to regurgitate what is known as a sociogram, i.e. a mosaic of information giving what the FBI hoped would be the clear picture of life on the left that had eluded their embarrassingly inept attempts at infiltration (agents have a lot of trouble with the acid-test).

The litany of abuses goes on. In city after city, from Burlington to Tuscon and Seattle to Gainesville, the political grand jury has sprung up, a menacing reality of the seventies. A thousand witnesses, many of whom were in no way connected with the crime under investigation, more than 100 juries in 40 states, have been called. Criticism has not been limited to the radical left. Senator Kennedy said, "We have witnessed the birth of a new political animal, the kangaroo grand jury. Spawned in a dark corner of the Justice Department, (it is) a dangerous form of Star Chamber inquisition that is trampling the rights of American citizens from coast to coast."

The Boston Project is only one of the groups concerned with letting people know what is happening to their institutions in the hands of officials armed with the power of the grand jury and the technology of the computer age. Another group is the Coalition to End Grand Jury Abuse, made up in part by the ACLU, the National Conference of Black Lawyers and American Friends Service Committee. The Coalition seeks to remedy by legislation. As of Spring, 1975, there were nine bills introduced in Congress. The most comprehensive of these is the one filed by Rep. John Conyers and 24 others. It includes procedural reforms such as the recording and transcribing of grand jury proceedings, a ban on evidence obtained through illegal means, right to counsel, and independent (of the prosecutor) inquiry by the jurors, as well as the abolition of forced immunity.

Until such reforms are made, the Boston Grand Jury Project advises non-collaboration with FBI, defense committees, public disclosure of what goes on in the secret chamber (a witness is the only one not legal advice. Above all, they caution against trying to outwit the FBI, and for being careful in answering any question. There is a danger in telling the FBI or federal prosecutors a simple thing such as your address because once you've answered anything in the "area of interest" you have waivered your right to remain silent under various sections of the Bill of Rights, and are then required to answer anything that deals with that area of interest including who else lives at that address, who sleeps with whom and in what rooms, etc.

Greek System Not A Social Trip

by Trudi Leib and Ann Jarrosek

The Greek system today is more than just a different approach to developing your social life. You have the opportunity to meet different types of people, be active in community affairs and form lasting relationships. In rushing, we found that each house tries to create a favorable impression that is often persuasive and confusing. As the rushee distinguishes between the houses, she finds diversity and personalities that are unique and individual. The first impression of perceived falseness soon disappears and the rushee finds the house best suited for her.

As the rushee becomes a pledge and approaches sisterhood, she finds friends to share good times and laughter as well as the tears and problems so often encountered in college life, and often throughout many years. Before rushing, we had no desire or interest in joining a sorority. Although we knew very little about the Greek system, we had a very negative attitude and stereotyped all Greeks. We saw all sorority girls as "social butterflies" seeking popularity, and all frat guys as "Mr. Cools." We did not know that sorority girls actually study and, in fact, have a higher curve than the average female collegiate on campus.

Living in the house provides a different aspect to dorm life. It is not only less expensive than living in a residence hall or an apartment, but it provides a homelike atmosphere not found elsewhere. By participating in house offices, one is able to develop a sense of responsibility and leadership qualities that are an asset to future life.

We have found that our original attitude about the Greeks is, for the most part, false. There are a few Miss Butterflies and Mr. Cools among the Greeks, but they are also found outside the Greek system. We are very happy that we joined a sorority house; many of our preconceptions have been disproved and the different aspects of our sisterhood have proven to be gratifying.

Strive, Strive!

(CPS)--Here's something else for students cramming and biting fingernails through college hoping for a place in medical school to worry about. Only one out of every three medical school hopefuls will ever be accepted.

The 44,000 students who thought they were going to medical school in 1975 filed about 360,000 applications--about nine per person. Slightly over 15,000 were accepted, according to the National Association of American Medical Colleges.

VPIRG And Auto Repairs

More than two hundred automobile dealers and mechanics turned out at a public hearing in Montpelier to protest the proposed regulations that would require auto service stations to give a written estimate for work over twenty five dollars. The mechanics argued that the new rules would infringe upon their rights to free enterprise. They frequently interrupted the hearing by applauding their approval or shouting out their outrage at speakers whom they disagreed with.

One speaker whom the mechanics did not approve of was Whitey Bluestein, the director of the Vermont Public Interest Research Group. Bluestein called the proposed regulations "a giant step for the Vermont consumer and the most significant state consumer protection rule that has ever come down the road."

The VPIRG director argued that the automobile repair business is an unregulated "million dollar bonanza." He added that surveys conducted by the student-run consumer action group indicate that hundreds of Vermonters feel that they are being ripped off by the automibile repair industry.

The automobile dealers responded to Bluestein's comments with disbelief. "We depend on repeat business," said Joseph Latif, a Bennington County dealer. "If fifty percent were ripped off as you say, do you think that I would still be in business."

The industry spokesman also predicted that the new rules would cause mechanics to jack

Tunnel Update

The tunnel elevator under construction

by John McDonald

The dead horse has been resurrected to be beaten once again. The pedestrian tunnel is back in the news and this time with action photos and real, live, on the scene reporting by yours truly. I found it difficult to get excited for the tunnel because it's been there for awhile. Yep, it's being built. I see the cranes and heavy machinery.

Regardless, progress has been made since our last coverage of the tunnel and some new complications have evolved.

Foreman Ron Gonyea summarized the major problems well, stating, "We ran into rock problems that set us back a couple of weeks. We had to dig about 2 to 3 feet deeper for about an 80 foot stretch in order to compensate for a drain pipe which goes under the actual tunnel itself."

The "digging" was actually blasting through the bed rock with dynamite. It sounds simple enough but takes some time. First the dynamite must be inserted in the rock. Then the area to be blasted is covered with 6 to 8 feet of dirt to muffle the explosion and finally the broken rock has to be removed before further construction.

Although things are a little bit behind schedule, the tunnel's starting to take shape. The aluminum culvert is approximately two-thirds complete. The stairs on the Living/Learning side of the road are partly finished and the elevator is rising surely. Right now four fuet of the eventual 36 foot elevator is complete and the remaining part should go fast. Also, the security building is presently boxed out, that is, the brick and concrete frame is ready for floors and walls. The remainder will be subcontracted out for electricity, carpentry and other finishing touches.

Foreman Ron Gonyea put the job at "almost 60% complete," and was confident of the progress made so far.

As he said, "It's running a couple of weeks behind but things are going to start to take shape really soon. They already are but once we get the culvert filled in and the road back to normal, things will run more smoothly."

The tunnel has broken through.

Ever Wonder Why You Don't Give Blood?

The 20 Most Common Excuses for Not Giving Blood
(The American Red Cross)

1. "No one has ever asked me to donate blood." Consider yourself invited. Blood comes from people. It can't be manufactured. Your gift can mean life for a sick child, an accident victim, or an elderly person facing surgery.

2. "I gave my blood voluntarily, but the Red Cross turned around and sold it." If you gave through the Red Cross, you must have been mistaken! Red Cross does charge hospitals for part of the expense of collections processing and distributing the blood. Hospitals often pass this charge on to the patient, but the Red Cross does not sell blood.

3. "Frankly, I'm scared of giving blood." Nearly everyone feels this way the first time. Donating blood, though, has become a habit with many people.

4. "My insurance covers the blood I need." Many insurance policies cover the cost of blood and its administration, but dollar bills can't be transfused. Blood must be available when a patient needs it.

5. "I don't like the Red Cross." Why not talk it out with us? A Red Cross representative could give you some facts about our services. Blood given through the Red Cross is distributed to hospitals. Voluntary donors are needed in every community. We provide the opportunity for you to become a donor.

6. "I already gave this year." Many donors give three and four times a year. You may donate every eight weeks, provided you are in good health.

7. "Other people must be giving enough blood." The demand for blood and blood products are constantly increasing. The needs of the patients must be met by more donors, people like you.

8. "I don't have any blood to spare." The average adult has about 10 to 12 pints of blood in his body. Doctors say that healthy people may give regularly.

9. "I'm too young." In Vermont you can become a blood donor at 17, with parental consent. At 18, no parental consent is needed.

10. "My blood isn't the right type." Every type is the right type. Even rare types are needed all the time.

11. "They wouldn't want my blood because of the illnesses I've had." If you have some doubts, check with your physician. The staff on duty will review your medical history before you make your donation. (Hepatitis, severe reactions to penicillin, and most heart problems are causes for permanent deferral.)

12. "I was pressured to give blood before, and I'm not going to donate again." Some recruiters, keenly aware of the need for blood, may be a little aggressive. The Red Cross can't "pressure" anyone into giving blood. Donations are completely voluntary. Many people need the blood that you alone can give.

13. "My blood isn't rich enough." A sample of your blood is checked before you donate.

14. "They'll take too much and I'll feel weak." Less than a pint is all that's taken. Your body manufactures new blood constantly. The volume you give will be replaced within a few hours. After donating, most people go about their usual activities.

15. "I'm afraid of being turned down." You may be medically deferred for a variety of reasons. If you are temporarily deferred, come back later and try again.

16. "It's too inconvenient to donate blood." The Red Cross tries to make donating as convenient as possible. Make an appointment for the time that's easiest for you. The telephone number is 864-4541, and the blood center is right across from OVP and Housing, practically on campus. Donating takes less than 10 minutes and the entire visit about an hour.

17. "I'm too busy." If you stop to think of all the good your blood donation can do, we believe you might decide you aren't too busy after all.

18. "I'm too thin." If you weigh 110 pounds or more, you can be accepted.

19. "I didn't realize my blood was needed." Every minute, 10 units of blood are needed in hospitals across the country. Decide to be a blood donor; now!

Just At Night?

(CPS)--Research being done at Memphis State University suggests that one side effect of marijuana smoking is loss of night vision. "Don't take your grandmother out driving at night if you've been smoking marijuana," a doctoral student at Memphis State said.

The student, Sheena Rose, has been doing a study of the effect of THC (the active ingredient of marijuana) on vision under simulated night lighting illumination.

Preliminary results of the tests indicate that the rabbits used in the experiments cannot see as well after a THC injection. The injections are not super-human amounts either. "My high dosage is probably less than the average street dose you can get from smoking two or three joints," Rose said.

Stud

by William A. Stephany and A.J. Andrea

Under the direction of Professors Alfred J. Andrea (history) and William A. Stephany (English), 12 students participated in the first annual summer medieval program in Assisi, Italy. The student group was heterogeneous in every respect, including age, academic interests, and respective levels of scholarly development. Despite these differences, the students were able to work well together and were instrumental in creating an atmosphere of common concern, mutual respect, cooperation, and bemused tolerance for the eccentricities of their instructors. Without their generous assistance the program would not have succeeded as well as it did. Perhaps because our group's number was mystically and archetypally correct, we were blessed by the goddess Fortuna or Divine Providence (depending on one's theological orientation). At every turn, despite the fact that the co-directors were gingerly feeling their way through all aspects of the program (not least of which was Andrea's neurotic concern that it not run out of money prematurely) and, in a sense, faking it as they went, virtually everything they did seemed to work out and to have had redeeming educational value. In fact, because both persons by temperament believe in "hanging loose", they were able to take advantage of several opportunities unexpectedly provided them, since the program schedule was, to say the least, sufficiently elastic. An example of this is the saga of the Sacred Convent.

One day while motoring into Assisi with our host Don Bruno Baldoni, Andrea, in an effort to make small-talk, remarked on the beauty of the cloister of San Francesco, which dominates the hillside from that direction. He then asked the apparently innocuous question, "Is it open to tourists?" Don Bruno immediately resolved to get the group in somehow. Normally the Sacred Convent is strictly cloistered, but Don Bruno would not accept this answer from the porter, who informed him it was out of the question. Fr. Baldoni kept on insisting that he must find an English speaking Franciscan for us who might carry some weight. All the while, Andrea, who was aghast (and secretly relieved) didn't care to go into the convent but simply wanted to begin the day's tour of Assisi as quickly as possible), tried vainly to dissuade the good Don Baldoni from pursuing the matter. Finally, our host found his English speaking Franciscan (with authority), Fr. George Sandor O.F.M. (convention) an American, and left us in Fr. George's care content in the knowledge that he had fulfilled the sacred and ancient duty of hospitality. Padre George was sympathetic to Don Bruno's request and contacted his superior and several other influential Franciscan friends. The result was that through this agency our group received the guided tours of the Sacred Convent, including a visit to the oldest subterranean

Study Abroad: Medieval Studies In Assisi

by William A. Stephany and A.J. Andrea

Under the direction of Professors Alfred J. Andrea (history) and William A. Stephany (English), 12 students participated in the first annual summer medieval program in Assisi, Italy. The student group was heterogeneous in every respect, including age, academic interests, and respective levels of scholarly development. Despite these differences, the students were able to work well together and were instrumental in creating an atmosphere of common concern, mutual respect, cooperation, and bemused tolerance for the eccentricities of their instructors. Without their generous assistance the program would not have succeeded as well as it did. Perhaps because our group's number was mystically and archetypally correct, we were blessed by the goddess Fortuna or Divine Providence (depending on one's theological orientation). At every turn, despite the fact that the co-directors were gingerly feeling their way through all aspects of the program (not least of which was Andrea's neurotic concern that it not run out of money prematurely) and, in a sense, faking it as they went, virtually everything they did seemed to work out and to have had redeeming educational value. In fact, because both persons by temperament believe in "hanging loose", they were able to take advantage of several opportunities unexpectedly provided them, since the program schedule was, to say the least, sufficiently elastic. An example of this is the saga of the Sacred Convent.

One day while motoring into Assisi with our host Don Bruno Baldoni, Andrea, in an effort to make small-talk, remarked on the beauty of the cloister of San Francesco, which dominates the hillside from that direction. He then asked the apparently innocuous question, "Is it open to tourists?." Don Bruno immediately resolved to get the group in somehow. Normally the Sacred Convent is strictly cloistered, but Don Bruno would not accept this answer from the porter, who informed him it was out of the question. Fr. Baldoni kept on insisting that he must find an English speaking Franciscan for us who might carry some weight. All the while, Andrea, who was aghast (and secretly really didn't care to go into the convent but simply wanted to begin the day's tour of Assisi as quickly as possible), tried vainly to dissuade the good Fr. Baldoni from pursuing the matter. Finally, our host found his English speaking Franciscan (with authority), Fr. George Sandor O.F.M. (conventional), an American, and left us in Fr. George's care content in the knowledge that he had fulfilled the sacred and ancient duty of hospitality. Padre George was sympathetic to Don Bruno's request and contacted his superior and several other influential Franciscan friends. The result was that through his agency our group received two guided tours of the Sacred Convent, including a visit to the oldest subterranean section, which is one of the finest examples of early 13th century Italian Gothic engineering which these authors have ever seen. Moreover, Fr. George, who became one of our many Franciscan patroni, also gave us a lengthy private tour of the upper and lower churches of San Francesco, sharing with us his knowledge of the Fresco art. Because he claimed to be a dilettante in the area of art history, he further arranged several three hour lecture tours conducted by Fr. P. Gerhard Ruf, O.F.M. (conventional). Fr. Ruf is an internationally recognized scholar, who has spent the past 16 years studying the art and architecture of the basilica of San Francesco and has recently published a highly acclaimed monograph of the structure of the lower church in an attempt to reconstruct (on paper) its physical form during its first 20 years of existence, before radical modifications were begun in the mid-13th century. During his first tour with us, Fr. Ruf shared his knowledge of and original insights into the meaning of the frescoes attributed to Giotto and his school. On our second tour he conceptually reconstructed for us a large portion of the original lower church, explaining patiently how he arrived at his still incomplete hypothesis. The excitement of original scholarship became apparent as Fr. Ruf led us from clue to clue, allowing us to see slowly how a picture of the earliest church (drastically different from that which one visits today) emerges as the clues are pieced together. At the same time, he admitted honestly where his picture was incomplete and where the evidence was contradictory or ambiguous. During both lecture-tours he expressed dismay that we had so little time to spend with him and pressed the point that next year he hopes we bring some art history majors who could crawl around the lower basilica with him, making measurements and exploring it in greater detail. We suggest the University explore the possibility of having some of our art history students work with Padre Ruf this coming summer and receive academic credit for their research.

Fr. George also did us the favor of securing permission for us to visit the treasury of the basilica where we viewed, among other things, an autograph ms. of St. Francis and the original bull of Honorious III recognizing the Franciscan Rule — again, both of these were thrilling moments for students of medieval civilization.

Also, because of our flexibility, we were able to accomodate several visiting scholars who, in return for bed and board, shared with us their expert knowledge of elements of medieval civilization which related to our course of studies. Our most important visitor was Dom Jean Le Clercq, O.S.B., a man who, on the strength of over 40 monographs and 700 articles, is recognized without dissent as the world's foremost authority on medieval monasticism. Fr. Jean spent four days with us, during which time he discussed, mainly, not his researches and publications of the past, (which he claimed would be a bore), but his most recent work and enthusiasms. Here again, we all could participate in the excitement and humility felt by a mature scholar as he, despite his advanced age and already established preeminence, explored new fields and asked new questions of old material.

The Sacred Convent of San Francesco

Despite his 66 years and frail health, Fr. Jean gave totally of himself physically and intellectually. He was particularly interested in talking with our students individually in the hope of transmitting some of his own love of learning and challenging them to continue the work he has begun. As all of us who have worked with him have discovered, Fr. Jean was totally selfless in offering, to all who would hear him, his most original, unpublished ideas, and he was genuinely interested in what our undergraduates thought and what they were doing.

In both the Fathers Ruf and Le Clercq our students were exposed to advanced European scholarship at its best. This alone made our six week program worthwhile.

Other unanticipated highpoints included a tour of ruined eleventh and twelfth century strongholds in the back of a beverage delivery truck courtesy of a local wholesale beverage distributer, who happened to be a fairly well-read student of Umbrian history. We had a chance meeting with a friend and distinguished medievalist, Dr. James M. Powell of Syracuse University whom we met in Florence. Rowell spent an afternoon with the group sharing his knowledge of late medieval Florentine art and informing us of his recent research into early 13th century relations between the papacy and the Franciscans.

Our curriculum consisted of approximately 100 hours of classroom lectures and discussions, divided equally between the two courses, and supervised travel with on the spot lectures delivered by both instructors. Free time was allowed for private sight-seeing, relaxation, and shopping. While the students seemed to learn from this form of instruction, both instructors believe that students in future years will benefit more if they are provided a workbook-guide. If students have such an aid, they will be able to work more independently of the instructors, and conversely, the instructors would be freed of the necessity of turning each class into an informational session and each trip into a facsimile of the Long March.

Quite simply, trying to keep a group together during a day of touring and lecturing on the hoof presents too many logistical problems, given the different physical abilities of the students and the noise and congestion of Italian streets.

With book in hand, students could proceed at their own pace to explore those areas and artifacts which the instructors have identified as relevant to the course. Before each trip students would be briefed about what they would see. The workbook-guide would contain a map and itinerary and, more important, commentaries and questions for reflection on what they will see. The day following the tour would contain a class for collective retrospection and discussion. Of course, on the days of the group tours the instructors would also follow the itinerary and would welcome any students who wished to accompany them.

Because the students also wish to enjoy themselves as tourists on these trips, the academic itinerary would be so constructed that a person of average physical abilities could complete it leisurely in half a day. Mindful of the needs of body, as well as soul, the guide would also provide some limited information on restaurants, available public toilets, shopping, and other sites of non-academic interest.

Concommitant with this workbook will be an expansion of class tours (since less time will have to be spent on disseminating background information in class). Additional time will be spent in Florence in '76 (our trip in '75 was too short to accomplish our pedagogical goals) and a 2 day tour to the area of Ravenna/Pavia is planned.

Above all else, both instructors believe it necessary to offer a single, team-taught course, in order to integrate more fully the material offered students. The course which they propose for 1976 is The World of Francis and Dante: A Study of the Civilization of Italy, ca. 1150 ca. 1350. In this, the 750th anniversary year of the death of St. Francis of Assisi, our students will study the art, history and literature of the society which produced these exponents of high medieval Christian civilization.

In addition, the instructors deem it necessary for '76's group to live closer to Assisi. Negotions are now being conducted to house our students in a common villa immediately outside of the walls of the city.

Finally, learning from our experience, we believe we should pursue the possibility of offering our students some instruction in basic Italian conversation. We hope to be able to make a native language teacher available to those students who wish to hire one.

In summary, we believe that our program this past year was worthwhile and, on the basis of our experiences, trust we can offer an even better program this coming summer.

College Week In Jamaica

On December 20, 1975 the annual Mid-year Break will become known as Annual College Week in Jamaica. The Jamaica Tourist Board and the College Marketing Research Corporation (a subsidiary of Playboy Enterprises, Inc.) have agreed that a vacation in an exotic foreign country need not be intellectually bland, financially depressing, or emotionally wasteful. In fact, the theme of College Week in Jamaica is "Travel can be more than just a Trip."

The three week-long sessions will be held in the beautiful, tropical mid-north-coast settlement of Ocho Rios, and the curriculum includes Sand Seminars, Open-air Rap Groups, Moonlight Mixers, Beach Carnivals and Feasts. There will even be a daily newspaper. The magic key to all of it is a special ID card available through the campus travel center or cooperating travel agents. The card is non-transferable and is a ticket of admission to all activities except the after-dark beach feast, and that is offered at half price to card holders. Cost of the card itself is a bargain — $10.

Ocho Rios hotels are mostly on the beach, so it should be simple to make the Seminars in the Sand, whether you elect the esoterics of Numerology and Astrology, the techniques of Meditation, Chanting, I-Ching, Hatha Yoga, Shiatsu or the communicatory mysteries of Tarot, Graphology and Massage.

The daily Open Air Rap groups will have a format of non-sexist, non-role-playing socializing with a wide range of pertinent topics. Daytime Beach Carnivals will include everything from kite flying to talent showcases, crab racing and other appropriate contests for beach life.

After-sunset activities — or Moonlight Mixers, — feature rum-punch parties, mini mixers (a late-40's Japanese tradition). Reggae, the Soul beat of Jamaica, limbo and other entertainments. The Beach Feasts will be a lucullan spread of appetizers, Jamaican soups, roast suckling pig, Jamaican barbeque chicken or steak, Jamaican rice-and-peas, salads, hard-dough bread, and tropical fruits and desserts.

For information on air and hotel package rates for College Week, check with your travel agent or the campus desk. If you want to hone your talents in any of the above subjects as a lecturer or performer, contact College Week — HQ, Playboy Enterprises, 747 Third Avenue, New York, New York 10017 (212-688-3030). And if you have already made plans to spend time between December 20 and January 10 somewhere else in Jamaica, you can still take in College Week at Ocho Rios by purchasing an ID card and asking for a transfer.

Incidentally, the average temperature in Ocho Rios during College Week is 78 — 80 degrees F.

Solar Energy Research

WASHINGTON — Three Vermonters, nominated by US Rep. James M. Jeffords R-Vt. have been named to serve on the newly-formed New England Energy Research and Development Task Force. The task force will serve to focus efforts to obtain federal funding for establishment of a New England Solar Energy Research Institute. In addition, it will provide support, technical advice and organization ideas on energy issues for the New England Congressional delegation, the governors of the New England States and the private sector.

One Solar Energy Research Institute will be funded by the US Energy Research and Development Administration (ERDA), and various regions of the country are competing for it. Initial funding for the institute would be about $7 million a year, and the figure would be increased in the future, to a level possibly as high as $50 million a year. The Vermonters nominated by Jeffords and named to the 24 member task force are: Former Governor Deane C. Davis; Kelton Miller, publisher of the Bennington Banner, and John Schnably of Townshend, acting coordinator of the New England Solar Energy Association.

"With people of this calibre serving on the Task Force, I think we have a good chance of getting the solar institute located in New England," Jeffords commented today.

Although the institute's mission would be for the benefit of the entire nation, Jeffords said, "in practice, if it is located in New England, its work would probably be better adapted to the specific and unique needs of our region."

He noted that of all the regions of the US, New England has by far the greatest dependence upon imported oil, and therefore the largest need for alternative power sources such as solar energy.

Membership in the Task Force was announced jointly by the co-chairmen of the New England Congressional Caucus, Rep. Edward P. Boland, D-Mass. and Rep. Silvio Conte, R-Mass.

"The Task Force's expertise is greatly needed and much appreciated and we look forward to a successful regional solar effort," Boland and Conte said. "Beyond this we anticipate a close continuing working relationship between the Congressional delegation and the Task Force concentrating on other ERDA funding and programs in the region."

Alumni Law Panel

On Saturday, November 15, the Student Pre-Law Association will present the "Alumni Law Panel." This program will consist of two informative sessions with UVM alumni who are either in law school or graduates thereof.

Last year's program proved quite interesting. Many were on hand to hear reflections of the panelists on their UVM experience, their law school experience, and the current involvement in the legal profession. These panelists ranged in experience from a law clerk to Justice Blackmun of the Supreme Court of the US to a student at Northeastern U. School of Law.

This year's program promises to be even more exciting.

Michael L. Buzak graduated from UVM in 1968. A 1971 graduate of Harvard Law School, he is presently an associate in Fried, Frank, Harris, Shriver and Jacobson, N.Y., N.Y.

David W. Curtis, UVM '60, graduated from Boston College Law School in 1963. He is now with the Burlington firm of Hoff, Curtis, Bryan, Quinn, and Jenkins.

A 1975 graduate of Boston College Law School, Sandra Christofolletti Quinn (UVM '72) will discuss the job market and "Women in Law."

Deirdre L. Thurber, UVM '73, is presently a student at St. John's University School of Law. She will discuss the study of law.

The general session, at 10:00 a.m. in North Lounge, Billings, will consist of a short presentation by each panelist. At the afternoon session in Marsh Lounge, Billings, the panelists will be available to answer questions on a one-to-one basis with students.

The panel, then, should provide an excellent opportunity to obtain candid answers to any questions you might have regarding the realities of law school, the legal profession, or the UVM experience in relation to these.

Scandinavian Seminar: A Highly Unconventional Foreign Study Program

by Verne Moberg

In an era when students from Moscow to Berkeley say they are suffering harmful side effects from mass education, and in a day when America apparently needs perceptive personal ambassadors more than ever before, it is gratifying to hear of an academic program based on independent achievement through firsthand language learning in a foreign culture.

The name of this program is the Scandinavian Seminar. After studying in Sweden under its auspices for a year, I am convinced that it is not only a highly unconventional foreign study program but also an unusually effective one.

Ever since 1949, the Scandinavian Seminar – a nonprofit institution of higher education chartered by the New York State Board of Regents – has been sending a growing number of students to Denmark, Finland, Norway, and Sweden for one academic year to learn a language and pursue independent studies. As a result, hundreds of Americans have gained impressive fluency in a Scandinavian language and developed their own intellectual interests in the process.

How does the Seminar operate, and what actually happens to its students in Scandinavia? What is the quality of their education and the result of their work? What are its shortcomings?

The Seminar is open to college undergraduates, graduates, and other qualified adults and does not require knowledge of a Scandinavian language prior to application. Each student's home base in Scandinavia is a particular folk high school – that peculiarly Scandinavian kind of residential school for adults – and his study there is supplemented by intensive language training, a "family stay" in a Scandinavian home, various conferences, assignments, lectures, and personal interviews, and the writing of a "project paper" to consummate his study.

The present director of the Seminar is Dr. Adolph Anderson, a somewhat unorthodox academician who serves as head planner and absentee father figure of the group (who are on their own most of the year). Academic director is Dr. Halfdan Gregersen, and executive secretary, Mrs. Gunnel Wrede. Four "national secretaries" handle arrangements in Scandinavia and are available for guidance to the fifty to one hundred students enrolled each year. Administrative headquarters of the Seminar are at 140 West 57th St. New York, N.Y. 10019.

Like Seminar students, Scandinavian folk high schools differ from each other in almost every conceivable way. School architecture varies from centuries-old castles to brand new Scandinavian modern buildings, and education styles range from tight schedules of compulsory classwork and heavy homework to more flexible curricula of elective interests and group research projects. Some folk high schools feature courses in fine arts and crafts while others emphasize social science and humanities or other specialities (a classmate of mine attended a school offering special assistance to handicapped students, and as a result, she even learned to speak Swedish with her hands to communicate with some deaf students). However, all folk high schools aim to give a sound basic education in the liberal arts and sciences, at academic levels varying with student and teacher aspiration and initiative. Traditionally, the schools stress close rapport and cooperation in their educational community (usually located in a rural area). Seminar students participate in these communities, sharing simple living accommodations on equal terms with Scandinavian students.

Because this study year is highly individualized and hard to evaluate numerically, Seminar students do not necessarily get college credit for their work, but – as educators are accepting new alternatives to regulated classroom study – more and more students are getting credit; those who attend such institutions as Cornell, Antioch, Goddard, New College, and the University of Wisconsin usually get some credit upon completing the program satisfactorily – and others earn language credit by passing proficiency exams. Many professors have extolled the language facility of returning Seminar students (some seem to speak like natives, they say, and even write term papers in Scandinavian languages) and remark often on their striking personal growth during the period as well.

Mark Twain once quipped that he would rather decline three free drinks than one German adjective, and most of us share his disdain for the busywork of basic language drills. The Seminar does not do away with such elementary exercise, but it does largely eliminate the element of choice: if a person lives among young Swedes who do not speak English easily, he will have to learn the declensions of a number of nouns in order to decline – or accept – even one bottle of Tuborg. And in time, managing life's amenities in his new tongue will be second nature.

Personally I found this a fascinating, if sometimes excruciating experience. Especially when I wanted to make an important point in exactly the right way and then failed, I'd feel like a linguistic cripple, as if my legs had been chopped off and I had to stumble around on wooden ones; of course, the saving factor in all this verbal stumbling is that it makes you want to learn that much faster – if only to save face.

Critics of the Seminar sometimes object that the folk high school experience has a "fun and games" flavor because it is not pitched at "university level." Were they to enroll in the Seminar themselves, however, they would soon discover that frivolity is hard indeed to bring off in a foreign language until you have learned it. Seminar alumni will attest that the year was as challenging as any they'd spent at an American college, for the initial adjustment into the language is invariably rugged (if equally comical), the isolation from familiar faces and the very texture of American reality can be disheartening, and the situation of being a foreigner – discovering that the word främmande might have negative as well as positive connotations – demands courage.

While wrestling once with the puzzle of "foreign-ness" I came across the late poet Randall Jarrell's novel Pictures from an Institution, in which he crystallizes American ethnocentricity:

> We despair of any nationality except our own, and we don't despair of it only because we don't take it seriously – we know that, at bottom, Americans are just people, a little more so than any foreigner ever manages to be; didn't Adam and Eve and the snake speak to each other in Standard American?

Hearing even biblical parables in Swedish (Adam och Eva och ormen pratade val rikssvenska?) helped me appreciate that Swedes might feel equally attached to their culture... and are, likewise, "just people" and then some. Of course, this kind of realization leads one to wonder about the real meaning of the word "democracy" – which ordinary Scandinavians seem to take somewhat seriously while Americans reserve its use for politicians and pundits – and to ponder its actual prospects on a world scale. Apparently, the Seminar has induced a number of students to think along similar lines, for many have entered some form of international service after returning from Scandinavia.

Many, too, have come back with considerable academic achievements: the project papers have covered subjects ranging from "Niels Bohr's Principles of Complimentarity" and "The Diplomatic Prelude to the Winter War" to analyses of Strindberg and Ibsen. Tackling such subjects in their own milieu through firsthand sources, students discover some of the pleasure and complexity of original research.

Of course, Americans are not inclined to sit through a long, dark winter without thinking up something to grubbla over. My own complaints on the Seminar call for closer contacts between staff and students (a thorny problem, with a separate campus for each student), more realistic appraisal of the student's situation (and less educationist's jargon), more accurate coordination of student interests to folk high school specialties, and more intensive efforts in raising scholarship funds. But what is reassuring to me about the weaknesses implied here is that I know personally that the staff is trying sincerely to do something about them; few students of multiversities would say as much for their administrators today.

All Students Eligible To Study Abroad

WHAT IS SCANDINAVIAN SEMINAR?

It is a unique learning experience in the four Nordic Countries: Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden. Since 1949 some two thousand Americans have participated in this program.

The Seminar believes that to be effective a foreign study program must be highly personal and challenging. It should also afford opportunities to participate in the community life of a foreign country.

Students learn best when they live abroad not as "permanent tourists" but as "short-term immigrants."

The Seminar's learning strategy is total immersion. Students live for one academic year in a completely Scandinavian environment, usually miles away from the other American students, where they acquire fluency in the language and become comfortable in the culture.

To live and study in Scandinavia may seem like a far-fetched idea; but it is a good place to learn. Rich in history and tradition, with constant reminders of a living past, Scandinavia stresses the future as it seeks answers to urgent problems of today. Get to know Scandinavia as it really is, through its own language and customs, and you are likely to be rewarded with a new awareness of yourself and your place in the world of people, a new confidence in your own resources.

WHO IS ELIGIBLE?

College undergraduates, graduates, and others who are interested in the Seminar's living and learning experience in Scandinavia.

No prior knowledge of a Scandinavian language is necessary to apply to the program. When accepted you will receive language tapes and other study materials as an introduction to your new language.

Applications are considered on a first come first served basis. The deadline for applying is April 15.

YOUR SCANDINAVIAN YEARS

SUMMER. Toward the end of July you are transplanted overnight into a new country, a new language, a new people, and a new way of life when the Seminar group leaves New York for Scandinavia. After an Introductory Session with interviews, consultations, lectures and excursions, you travel in separate groups to the Seminar's intensive Language Course in your new country. After three weeks of concentrated language learning together, you separate to live for some time with a Scandinavian Family – where you will practice your new language in daily conversation.

FALL. By the end of the language course your National Secretary will have assigned you to a Folk High School that seems suited to your particular needs and interests, where you will spend the Fall Term living and studying through December. Over the Christmas holidays you may want to visit your Scandinavian family or travel on your own.

MID-WINTER. Just after the New Year the entire Seminar group from all the countries gathers with the National Secretaries and the administrative staff from New York in wintry Norway. This 5-day Midyear Session is devoted to discussions, project planning, language tests, recreation, as well as renewing friendships, gaining perspective, and enjoying a welcome change.

SPRING. Back at your school in January the Spring Term begins. While you continue classes, you also concentrate on an Independent Study Project in an area of special interest to you.

LANGUAGE LEARNING

Experience has shown that in the course of one Seminar year most students can acquire facility in speaking, reading and writing a Scandinavian language far beyond the skill they would normally have attained after two or three years of studying a foreign language at an American college.

Intensive language courses arranged by the Seminar in each country occupy the first few weeks after arrival there. Then the new accomplishment is put into practice living with a Scandinavian family. At the Folk High School formal language training in the classroom is resumed, with tutorial help added as needed. During the year the Scandinavian National Secretaries assign additional readings in the appropriate language.

WHAT ARE THE FOLK HIGH SCHOOLS?

Each Seminar student is placed individually in a unique Scandinavian learning community designed essentially for young adults, a Folk High School, which is neither a high school nor a college in the American sense.

Folk High Schools are mostly small (usually about 50 to 100 students), residential, and co-educational, where the communal aspects of life are stressed, and the educational experience is grounded in a close relationship between teachers and students. Generally characterized by the absence of purely vocational objectives, conventional examinations or grades, these communities have been intended to serve as "schools for life"...to develop not mind and thought alone but the whole person.

Old Cathedral in the town of Visby on the island of Gotland

There are as many kinds of Folk High Schools as there are schools; they also differ from country to country. Some are in rural areas; others are near or within cities or towns. Some are organized along very traditional lines with a patriarchal, family quality; some are extremely liberal with emphasis on self-government; and there are all kinds in between.

Each school derives its distinctive personality not only from its director and faculty but also from its sponsor, such as church, trade union, or community organization, and from the composition of its current student body.

Collectively, the students in these schools form a wide cross-section of Scandinavians. The schools themselves – sometimes called "People's Colleges" – have functioned for more than a century as symbols of democracy and a training ground for leadership contributing to social, economic, and political growth in the Scandinavian countries.

Curricula vary considerably. Generally these are basic courses in the liberal arts, literature, history, philosophy, government, sociology, economic systems, and comparative religion, taught from the Scandinavian point of view.

EVALUATION AND CREDIT FOR SEMINAR YEAR

As a one-year independent study abroad program the Seminar itself does not grant credit directly. It can only make recommendations. Each student's evaluation is an extensive report which is sent at the student's request to the home college or other institution. Depending on what the student has accomplished, the Seminar recommends that up to a year's credit (about 30 semester hours) be granted by the college.

COST OF SEMINAR

The fee of $3,800 covers tuition, room and board, one-way transportation from New York to Scandinavia, and all Seminar-connected travel within Scandinavia. It does not include personal expenses, books, materials used at school, or return transportation. On the basis of financial need, limited interest-free loans are available, as are a few special scholarships.

Chem Dept Spikes Ice In Attempt To Fatally Poison Frat Boys

by Martin Algerns

The small signs, one on each of the two ice machines on Cook's third floor, said, "Contaminated with NaCn." Now all laymen know NaCn is sodium cyanide — right? The Encyclopedia Britannica calls cyanide "superlovin' so poisonous that a taste (less than seven drops) probably would kill a man."

When questioned, a graduate student lab instructor angrily told me, "The cyanide was put there because some frat boys threatened a grad student (for ice)." (Good work frat boys!) I was outraged to learn the Chemistry Department would sanction putting cyanide into ice cubes so no one would steal them — because if they did, they'd die. Such asinine reasoning! First of all, those who steal ice cubes most likely would not be affiliated with the Chemistry Department and would not know what NaCn is. You'd think an intelligent chemist would have the foresight to figure that one out, wouldn't you? Secondly, anyone stealing ice would probably be in a hurry, maybe even drunk, (that's not too unusual around here) and obviously not into reading signs. (Oh, sorry, just another slight oversight by the Chemistry Department, right?) Boy, are they stupid!

Dr White, Chairman of the Chemistry Department, told me to "forget about it." He also said, "...both machines were contaminated by accident." (Hmmm.) I had figured our chemist friends over in Cook would be a little more careful with such deadly poisons. Apparently they must be very careless for it to end up in two different ice machines, three hundred feet apart — "by accident." Also, why then did that lab instructor tell me it was not an accident? To confuse matters more, Dr. Gregg told me, "I shouldn't believe everything I read," meaning it wasn't really contaminated at all. Dr. White said it was contaminated by accident, a graduate student lab instructor told me it was contaminated on purpose, and Dr. Gregg said it wasn't contaminated at all. So far, that's two for contamination and one against. They can't even get the story straight amongst themselves!

The "lies," excuse me, "distortion," no, I mean "misunderstanding," did not end there. I notified Ralph Levine, an assistant to the President of the University. He was distressed by the situation and acted immediately to investigate. He told me later, according to Chemistry Department information, that as soon as the machines cycled through a few times, they would be clean and the signs would be removed. Why then did Dr. White tell me earlier that same day, "...the machines would remain contaminated indefinitely, and there was no way to decontaminate them." I am sorry, Mr. Levine, but what they told you is not the same as what they told me.

It is insane that an intelligent person would purposefully bait the ice machines with cyanide just for spite. Is it worth someone dying, whether he be a twenty year old obnoxious drunk or a ten-year old wandering through Cook (for whatever reason ten-year olds wander anywhere) and 'sneaking' an ice cube? It could happen. If it did, and someone died or became violently ill, what would you say then, Chemistry Dept?

Something must be done, both to the Chemistry Department's rationale and to their ice machines. The former responsibility rests with the Administration and Board of Trustees. The latter should go to the Chemistry Dept's budget coordinator so they can buy new ice machines. Those machines are a threat to someone's life. It is simply too easy for an accident to occur, for an unwary person to grab an ice cube, whether it be now, or next July. The machines must be replaced.

Icelandic Poor Grammar Illegal

by Mary D. Partridge

As a child of six or seven, I saw my first public fist fight in a restaurant in Reykjavik, Iceland. It wasn't a drunken brawl or a fight of honor. These two Icelanders were fighting over the correct syntax of a word. In Iceland, a dispute of this kind can be legally settled: proper word use and grammer are determined by the Althing, the Icelandic parliament.

The culture of Iceland is largely based on its language and literature. The first Icelandic settlers came from western Norway in about the ninth century. Their language, a dialect of Old Norwegian, has remained virtually unchanged over the centuries. The adoption of the Latin alphabet in 1100 marks the beginning of the golden age of literature, when the renowned Icelandic Sagas were written.

After 1300, Icelandic literature underwent its Dark Ages. During this period, the Sagas served to maintain the traditional language.

It is a combination of the wealth of early literature, the close-knit social structure of the Icelandic people and the geographic isolation of the island which has resulted in the purity of modern Icelandic. Icelanders today can still read their 12th century literature in its original form. Iceland is a philopist's paradise.

During the Middle Ages, words were borrowed from Celtic, Latin, the Romantic languages and Danish. But in the 18th century, a movement to purify Icelandic was initiated. Since then, foreign words have been replaced with words of native origin — either obsolete words which are reactivated, or new words which are coined according to the structural principles of Icelandic.

Icelandic is comparable to a living Latin. Like Latin, Icelandic has three genders (masculine, feminine, neuter); there are four declensions in Icelandic while Latin has five.

The other Scandanavian languages have eliminated many grammatical details, but Icelandic has not changed significantly except in its pronunciation. It is due to the conscious effort of the Icelanders that the traditional language, the Scandanavian mother tongue, is alive. It is Iceland's language which makes this country culturally distinct from Scandanavia.

Icelandic is spoken by the 202,000 inhabitants of Iceland and by about 20,000 Icelandic immigrants to North America. Literacy has been general in Iceland since the end of the 18th century. It is reported that no illiteracy exists there today.

New words cannot be introduced into the language without the approval of the Althing.

Halldor Laxness, an Icelander who won the 1955 Novel Prize for Literature, used an unapproved vulgarism in one of his books. The word was noticed and Laxness was fined. He claimed to have included the word as a test of the language-awareness of Icelanders.

Workshop On East-West Trade

The UVM Center for Language and Area Studies for the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe is sponsoring a Workshop on East-West Trade on November 14 and 15 at the Living/Learning Center's Commons Auditorium.

The program includes speakers from government, foreign embassies, business, agriculture, banking, labor and academia. Among them are representatives of the Bureaus of East-West Trade of the Department of Commerce and the Department of Agriculture, commercial counsellors from the embassies of the Soviet Union, Poland, Rumania and Bulgaria, officials of the Vermont Agency of Development and Community Affairs and Vermont businessmen, representatives of the Chase Manhattan Bank and representatives of national farming, labor and trading associations.

The meetings, scheduled for 2 p.m. on Friday, November 14 and 10 a.m. and 2 p.m. on Saturday, November 15, will be concluded with a lecture by Professor Marshall I. Goldman of Wellesley College, author of the recently published book, Detente and Dollars. His topic will be "Problems and Pitfalls in East-West Trade," and his talk will begin at about 3 p.m.

The main purpose of the Workshop is to acquaint the Vermont community businessmen, farmers, teachers and students alike — with the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. The Workshop is financed by a grant of the US Office of Education which designated the UVM program as one of the two undergraduate centers of the entire country, promoting inter-disciplinary education in Russian and East European studies, as well as serving the community.

Coordinator of the Workshop is Professor L.A.D. Dellin of the Department of Economics, who is an authority on East-West trade.

All meetings are free and open and the public is invited to attend. Luncheon facilities are available in the cafeteria of the Living/Learning Center.

Further information may be obtained by calling Ext. 4062.

Contraception Breakthrough

(CPS) — A new contraceptive which prevents fertilization of the egg through the use of several, safe organic chemical inhibitors has been developed at the University of Georgia.

A University biochemist, Dr. William L. Williams, and his colleagues discovered chemical agents that can be used to prevent the sperm from penetrating the egg without upsetting the natural hormone cycle of the body.

According to Williams, the contraceptive will be immune to most of the drawbacks of regular contraceptives such as menstrual irregularities, fluid retention, gastric disturbances, irritability and headaches.

Also there is no possibility of danger or damage to the woman's reproductive capacity, Williams added.

The newly-developed contraceptive has been tested on several kinds of animals, especially rabbits.

"There is no human contraceptive product that is able to successfully stop rabbits from reproducing. If a method of contraception can be developed that will prevent pregnancy in rabbits, it should work even better in human females," Williams said.

Top World Freestyle

Dateline...Wayne Wong—skiing's best-known freestyle skier—will be appearing Downhill Edge, from 2 PM to 6 PM to answer questions about freestyle skiing and his own special brand of hotdogging.

That night, Wayne and Friends of UVM Skiing will be hosting a special Salomon Film Festival, featuring the newest and best of ski films, at the Patrick Gym. Tickets will be available beginning today, Thursday, November 13, only at the Downhill Edge shop.

Wayne Wong has claimed many freestyle titles during the past few years. Named Skiing Magazine's First Hotdogger of the Year in 1972, Wayne had won all the Ballet events at the Eastern, Western and National Championships that year. In 1973 he won the first European Hotdog Contest, and in 1974, he added the title of Rocky Mountain Champion to his list of accomplishments. Last February, Wayne travelled to Japan and captured the overall win in the Japanese International Freestyle Championship at Showa-Nakazato, Japan.

Wayne has been head freestyle coach at Waterville Valley, New Hampshire, captain of the Salomon Freestyle Demo Team, and a ski tester for Skiing. For the past two summers, Wayne has been a member of the coaching staff at the Salomon "Make Me Hot" Summer Freestyle Camps.

QUESTION: What causes acne? People have told me that it is caused by eating greasy foods. Is this true? Is the oil that I find on my face from the grease in the foods? If I stopped eating french fries, would I lose my acne?

ANSWER: The precise causes of acne are unknown. The pustules, or pimples, which characterize it occur in certain oil-secreting structures of the skin. Hormonal factors are of importance since acne flares up with adolescence and is made worse by certain types of hormonal preparations and better by others. Certain types of birth control pills can cause flare-ups of acne while other types are used to treat acne. This plague is often made worse by emotional stress.

Recent evidence does not support the idea that eating specific foods makes acne worse. There might be some individual exceptions, but by and large chocolate, nuts and greasy foods are not the cause of skin eruptions. Nor, is the indulgence in particular sexual activities a factor.

Among the do-it-yourself things available, the use of drying soaps, frequent washing of the skin, and the use of over-the-counter preparations for active acne (those contain resorcinol, salicylic acid, and other drying agents) all help. For severe cases or deep infections, a physician should be consulted. The danger of severe untreated acne is development of bad skin infections and severe scarring. The medical treatments for active acne include the long-term use of low doses of certain antibiotics (which seem to stop bacteria which modify the structure of the fatty acids that produce the inflammation) and the topical use of various other preparations. Post-acne scarring can be handled by a variety of dermatologic procedures such as dermabrasion and freezing the skin.

This is Part I of a two-part series dealing with the origins and treatment of syphilis.

No one is quite sure how it began. One school of thought which has been called, appropriately enough, the "Columbian School" believes that syphilis was endemic in Hispaniola (Haiti) and was contracted by Columbus' crew on his second voyage and carried back to Spain.

This second voyage returned to Palos Bay, thence to Barcelona by way of Seville; thus, according to this school of thought, the infection began in these ports.

In 1494 King Charles the VIII of France set seige upon Naples. His army included mercenaries from virtually every country in Europe, including Spain. Shortly after the fall of Naples, syphilis became widespread throughout the King's army and, subsequently, the city. French troops who became infected were returned to their homeland and no doubt spread the infection along the way.

The other school of thought is the pre-Columbian theory which asserts that syphilis was present in Europe and the Old World throughout the ages. This theory further suggests that although syphilis was present in Europe prior to Columbus' voyage, it was either confused with other diseases, unrecognized or, more likely, present in a much milder form.

Regardless of the origin, there is no question that rather suddenly in the mid-1490's a pandemic of syphilis swept throughout Europe. In that form, it was apparently a very acute disease, frequently fatal in its secondary stages and, because of its severity, received immediate recognition from physicians of the time as being a new medical problem.

Fortunately, this very severe form of syphilis apparently changed rather quickly to the form which we recognize today. As early as 1500, the venereal mode of transmission was recognized and quite accurate clinical descriptions were given.

Syphilis initially was known by a variety of names — in France it was known as the "disease of Naples"...in Naples it was known as the "French disease" ...in England as "the Spanish disease." Other names appeared in the medical literature and, among these, was "Great Pox." Syphilis as Great Pox, was differentiated from the disease "Small Pox." The latter term, of course, we still use today in describing the disease of smallpox.

An English surgeon, Thomas Gale, introduced the word "syphilis" into the English language in 1563. Gale undoubtedly took the word from the hero of a poem written by Fracastorious in 1530 entitled, "Syphilis Sive Morbus Gallicus." The poem described a mythical shepherd, Syphilus, affected with the French disease as punishment for cursing the Gods.

Although the disease was known and diagnosed as early as 1500 and although various forms of mercury compounds had been recognized as a treatment for syphilis as early as 1497, no satisfactory treatment was available until 1910.

Dr. Paul Ehrlich (a Nobel Prize winner in 1908 for immunologic research) turned his attention to the problem of therapy for syphilis. Knowing from previous work that certain of the organic arsenical compounds had shown promise of being toxic to spirochetes, Erhrlich synthesized and tested a long series of various arsenic compounds.

The 606th preparation, which was called arsphenamine or Salvarsan, turned out to be an effective drug for the treatment of syphilis. However, clinical cure required repeated injections over a period of one to two years. This single medication represented virtually the only effective treatment for syphilis until the discovery of penicillin.

The prevalence of syphilis in America became apparent with the outbreak of World War I and venereal diseases constituted a major cause of rejection from the Armed Services and evidence suggested that approximately one American in ten was affected with syphilis.

This finding led to the establishment of the Venereal Disease Division of the Public Health Services in 1918, but little more was done until the appointment of Dr. Thomas Parran as Surgeon General in 1936.

Dr. Parran was able to gain public awareness of the problem and began programs for control of the disease. The outbreak of World War II served as a major impetus to the further development of treatment programs and centers and, during this time, it was considered virtually unpatriotic not to have a blood test for syphilis.

Thus, a dramatic drop in cases occurred in the late 1940's and 1950's and this so continued until 1955 to 1957 when a low of approximately 6,500 cases annually was reported.

However, the incidence once again began to climb as the programs for diagnosis, treatment and control became non-functional and by 1963 there were 22,000 new cases annually. There is no certainty, at this time, that the incidence of the disease is falling or even levelling off.

The culture of Iceland is largely based on its language and literature. The first Icelandic settlers came from western Norway in about the ninth century. Their language, a dialect of Old Norwegian, has remained virtually unchanged over the centuries. The adoption of the Latin alphabet in 1100 marks the beginning of the golden age of literature, when the renowned Icelandic Sagas were written.

After 1300, Icelandic literature underwent its Dark Ages. During this period, the Sagas served to maintain the traditional language.

It is a combination of the wealth of early literature, the close-knit social structure of the Icelandic people and the geographic isolation of the island which has resulted in the purity of modern Icelandic. Icelanders today can still read their 12th century literature in its original form. Iceland is a philologist's paradise.

During the Middle Ages, words were borrowed from Celtic, Latin, the Romantic languages and Danish. But in the 18th century, a movement to purify Icelandic was initiated. Since then, foreign words have been replaced with words of native origin -- either obsolete words which are reactivated, or new words which are coined according to the structural principles of Icelandic.

Icelandic is comparable to a living Latin. Like Latin, Icelandic has three genders (masculine, feminine, neuter); there are four declensions in Icelandic while Latin has five.

The other Scandanavian languages have eliminated many grammatical details, but Icelandic has not changed significantly except in its pronunciation. It is due to the conscious effort of the Icelanders that the traditional language, the Scandanavian mother tongue, is alive. It is Iceland's language which makes this country culturally distinct from Scandanavia.

Icelandic is spoken by the 202,000 inhabitants of Iceland and by about 20,000 Icelandic immigrants to North America. Literacy has been general in Iceland since the end of the 18th century. It is reported that no illiteracy exists there today.

New words cannot be introduced into the language without the approval of the Althing.

Halldor Laxness, an Icelander who won the 1955 Novel Prize for Literature, used an unapproved vulgarism in one of his books. The word was noticed and Laxness was fined. He claimed to have included the word as a test of the language-awareness of Icelanders.

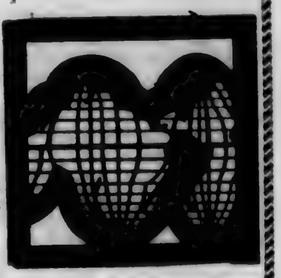
Workshop On East-West Trade

The UVM Center for Language and Area Studies for the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe is sponsoring a Workshop on East-West Trade on November 14 and 15 at the Living/Learning Center's Commons Auditorium.

The program includes speakers from government, foreign embassies, business, agriculture, banking, labor and academia. Among them are representatives of the Bureaus of East-West Trade of the Department of Commerce and the Department of Agriculture, commercial counsellors from the embassies of the Soviet Union, Poland, Rumania and Bulgaria, officials of the Vermont Agency of Development and Community Affairs and Vermont businessmen, representatives of the Chase Manhattan Bank and representatives of national farming, labor and trading associations.

The meetings, scheduled for 2 p.m. on Friday, November 14 and 10 a.m. and 2 p.m. on Saturday, November 15, will be concluded with a lecture by Professor Marshall I. Goldman of Wellesley College, author of the recently published book, Detente and Dollars. His topic will be "Problems and Pitfalls in East-West Trade," and his talk will begin at about 3 p.m.

The main purpose of the Workshop is to acquaint the Vermont community businessmen, farmers, teachers and students alike -- with the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. The Workshop is financed by a grant of the US Office of Education which designated the UVM program as one of the two undergraduate centers of the entire country, promoting inter-disciplinary education in Russian and East European studies, as well as serving the community.



Coordinator of the Workshop is Professor L.A.D. Dellin of the Department of Economics, who is an authority on East-West trade.

All meetings are free and open and the public is invited to attend. Luncheon facilities are available in the cafeteria of the Living/Learning Center.

QUESTION: What causes acne? People have told me that it is caused by eating greasy foods. Is this true? Is the oil that I find on my face from the grease in the foods? If I stopped eating french fries, would I lose my acne?

ANSWER: The precise causes of acne are unknown. The pustules, or pimples, which characterize it occur in certain oil-secreting structures of the skin. Hormonal factors are of importance since acne flares up with adolescence and is made worse by certain types of hormonal preparations and better by others. Certain types of birth control pills can cause flare ups of acne while other types are used to treat acne. This plague is often made worse by emotional stress.

Recent evidence does not support the idea that eating specific foods makes acne worse. There might be some individual exceptions, but by and large chocolate, nuts and greasy foods are not the cause of skin eruptions. Nor, is the indulgence in particular sexual activities a factor.

Among the do-it-yourself things available, the use of drying soaps, frequent washing of the skin, and the use of over-the-counter preparations for active acne (those contain resorcinol, salicylic acid, and other drying agents) all help. For severe cases or deep infections, a physician should be consulted. The danger of severe untreated acne is development of bad skin infections and severe scarring. The medical treatments for active acne include the long-term use of low doses of certain antibiotics (which seem to stop bacteria which modify the structure of the fatty acids that produce the inflammation) and the topical use of various other preparations. Post-acne scarring can be handled by a variety of dermatologic procedures such as dermabrasion and freezing the skin.

This is Part I of a two-part series dealing with the origins and treatment of syphilis.

No one is quite sure how it began. One school of thought which has been called, appropriately enough, the "Columbian School" believes that syphilis was endemic in Hispaniola (Haiti) and was contracted by Columbus' crew on his second voyage and carried back to Spain.

This second voyage returned to Palos Bay, thence to Barcelona by way of Seville; thus, according to this school of thought, the infection began in these ports.

In 1494 King Charles the VIII of France set seige upon Naples. His army included mercenaries from virtually every country in Europe, including Spain. Shortly after the fall of Naples, syphilis became widespread throughout the King's army and, subsequently, the city. French troops who became infected were returned to their homeland and no doubt spread the infection along the way.

The other school of thought is the pre-Columbian theory which asserts that syphilis was present in Europe and the Old World throughout the ages. This theory further suggests that although syphilis was present in Europe prior to Columbus' voyage, it was either confused with other diseases, unrecognized or, more likely, present in a much milder form.

Regardless of the origin, there is no question that rather suddenly in the mid-1490's a pandemic of syphilis swept throughout Europe. In that form, it was apparently a very acute disease, frequently fatal in its secondary stages and, because of its severity, received immediate recognition from physicians of the time as being a new medical problem.

Fortunately, this very severe form of syphilis apparently changed rather quickly to the form which we recognize today. As early as 1500, the venereal mode of transmission was recognized and quite accurate clinical descriptions were given.

Syphilis initially was known by a variety of names -- in France it was known as the "disease of Naples"...in Naples it was known as the "French disease" ...in England as "the Spanish disease." Other names appeared in the medical literature and, among these, was "Great Pox." Syphilis as Great Pox, was differentiated from the disease "Small Pox." The latter term, of course, we still use today in describing the disease of smallpox.

An English surgeon, Thomas Gale, introduced the word "syphilis" into the English language in 1563. Gale undoubtedly took the word from the hero of a poem written by Fracastorious in 1530 entitled, "Syphilis Sive Morbus Gallicus." The poem described a mythical shepherd, Syphilus, affected with the French disease as punishment for cursing the Gods.

Although the disease was known and diagnosed as early as 1500 and although various forms of mercury compounds had been recognized as a treatment for syphilis as early as 1497, no satisfactory treatment was available until 1910.

Dr. Paul Ehrlich (a Nobel Prize winner in 1908 for immunologic research) turned his attention to the problem of therapy for syphilis. Knowing from previous work that certain of the organic arsenical compounds had shown promise of being toxic to spirochetes, Erhrlich synthesized and tested a long series of various arsenic compounds.

The 606th preparation, which was called arsphenamine or Salvarsan, turned out to be an effective drug for the treatment of syphilis. However, clinical cure required repeated injections over a period of one to two years. This single medication represented virtually the only effective treatment for syphilis until the discovery of penicillin.

The prevalence of syphilis in America became apparent with the outbreak of World War I and venereal diseases constituted a major cause of rejection from the Armed Services and evidence suggested that approximately one American in ten was affected with syphilis.

This finding led to the establishment of the Venereal Disease Division of the Public Health Services in 1918, but little more was done until the appointment of Dr. Thomas Parran as Surgeon General in 1936.

Dr. Parran was able to gain public awareness of the problem and began programs for control of the disease. The outbreak of World War II served as a major impetus to the further development of treatment programs and centers and, during this time, it was considered virtually unpatriotic not to have a blood test for syphilis.

Thus, a dramatic drop in cases occurred in the late 1940's and 1950's and this so continued until 1955 to 1957 when a low of approximately 6,500 cases annually was reported.

However, the incidence once again began to climb as the programs for diagnosis, treatment and control became non-functional and by 1963 there were 22,000 new cases annually. There is no certainty, at this time, that the incidence of the disease is falling or even levelling off.

A Chinese Coal-Miner Tells His Story

by John Bermingham

In the spring of 1972, I was fortunate to be able to visit the People's Republic of China as one of thirty members in a delegation of scholars from this country who study China. This was a very exciting time to be visiting China, not only because the first American president to ever pay an official visit to that country had just left three weeks before we went there, but also because very few Americans had been able to go to China for so many years. In fact, it had not been very many years before that that any Americans who did visit China would have been illegally stripped of their passports due to the idiotic policies of our own Department of State.

Having divided into two groups of fifteen each which would travel north from Canton on separate itineraries and join up in Peking, by late March the group I was in had arrived in Shenyang (Mukden), Liaoning Province, Northeast China (Manchuria) for a one week stay. The cities in which we stopped as well as the time we spent in them and the activities which were scheduled for us were all arranged by China Travel Service, International. We were free, however, to walk about in any place that we were staying. As someone who had already lived for a total of two and a half years in the Republic of China (Taiwan) and who had been studying Chinese language and literature almost full time for nine years, I was very eager to get around on my own and felt no fear of just hopping on a bus and talking to the people I met on it, going into little sidewalk restaurants and chatting with the cooks and customers, etc. Having somewhat familiarized myself with certain sections of Shenyang by doing just that, as well as going out with the other fourteen American scholars on visits to various cultural and industrial sites organized for us by our hosts, I was ready to spend a whole day out of Shenyang in the nearby city of Fushun which is on the edge of the world's largest open-pit coal mine. Passing through the outskirts of Fushun, I was reminded of the coal mining cities I had seen in Northern England and Wales with their rows of company housing. Of course, there were no automobiles to be seen here in Fushun and it was somewhat cleaner if just as drab.

After having gone down about twelve hundred feet below the surface of the earth to visit underground coal mining operations and visiting the health clinic for the coal miners which had special equipment for treating the serious health complaints to which miners are subject, I was informed that my request to interview someone who had worked here in this mine for more than twenty five years would be granted. I had made this request for two reasons: first of all, while living with peasant families on a rural commune in Henan Province the week before, the 45 year old peasant with whom I had lived for four days had been forced to leave his home in the early 1940's and work in a coal mine in Manchuria until 1950 when he had returned to his home in Henan. Secondly, I had frequently suffered from a certain amount of frustration and boredom listening to the often long-winded 'canned' speeches and their translation into English by our excellent and conscientious guides with which we were treated at every single place we visited, thus I was hoping to learn much more by having a private talk with no translator intervening while the rest of the group was madly taking notes at the pre-arranged and all too predictable "briefings."

Our sumptuous banquet with much good-hearted toasting and expressions of friendship being over, I had the very real pleasure of meeting Lu Xin-ke. For the next two hours, I sat and listened and asked him questions while he went back into his early years and dredged up memories almost too painful to be remembered. It is my conviction that I was conversing with a totally honest and decent human being, one who became choked with emotion and trembled a great deal during times when he told me this chilling story. Before it was over, I was feeling very guilty for having caused him the pain of reliving those early years, yet I think he was glad to have done it for he could see that it was very helpful to my understanding of why China had to take drastic steps to get out of the bind she was in and what the revolution has meant to some very simple people. We ran out of time long before Lu Xin-ke was finished telling me about the changes that have taken place in his life since the socialist revolution, but before I left, I promised him that I would bring his life story back to America and try to have it made known to people here. He said that if I would do that, he was glad to have told it to me.

There are many times during a trip in China, particularly for those who can speak the language and who are familiar with the Chinese culture, when you become bored and disgusted by the implausible, almost ritualistic, reiteration of slogans, Maoist precepts, ideological interpretations forced on to virtually every aspect of human activity. On the other hand, if you can find a way to just talk to people as people without the somewhat inhibiting presence of the official guide-translator, it is possible to encounter memorable individuals as Lu Xin-ke is for me. It goes without saying that such encounters are few and far between and that a fairly high level of competency in Chinese language is essential. This is the story of a Chinese coal-miner, in his own words as I noted it down and translated into English.

.... We and a large number of Laiwa people felt that if we stayed, we would starve to death'

I was born in Shandong Province, Laiwu County, in 1927. We were poor peasants with no land of our own. My father and elder brother worked as hired hands. My mother died when I was nine years old. She got sick and as we had no money to buy medicine, she died. Besides the brother who was four years older, I also had a younger brother but no sisters...

When I was fifteen, the Japanese Army came to Laiwu and many other districts of Shandong to carry out their campaign of systematic killing and destruction. That was 1942. Our village was completely destroyed by the Jap soldiers, every house burnt to the ground, the homes of more than 100 families wiped out by the invaders. Some people who had relatives or good friends in other villages went to live with them; but those who didn't have anyone to stay with had to roam about aimlessly, living from hand to mouth. However, before we had starved to death, a guy who had become a recruiter for the Japs arrived looking for people to hire on to go work in the Northeast (Manchuria). He was a man from our district and I can still remember his name and his face—Wang the Pockmarked—a Chinese who preferred to betray his own people in order to become a "dog let" for the Japanese invaders. He recruited us by promising that if we went to work in the mines of Manchuria, we would have lots of millet to eat and regular big houses to live in, as well as a pretty good salary. Of course, neither my father or elder brother believed all this but with the conditions in our area as they were, we and a large number of Laiwu people felt that if we stayed, we would starve to death. We didn't believe it could be worse up there in the Northeast.

At this time, more than twenty of the homeless people from our village went in a group to the big city of Jinan in order to sign on with the Japanese mining company. We had to go to a big recruiting station there. Out of the twenty of us who went in that particular group, there were four of us and maybe four or five women. Wang the Pockmarked had told us that we would be going to Fushun. Later on there were more people from my village who wound up coming here to work. Well, as soon as we entered the recruiting station in Jinan, we saw that the system was nothing like what they had told us. There were many many people inside, many without a place to sit or food or water, waiting for a physical examination. If the doctors found anything wrong with you, then you would be rejected out of hand and thrown out of a side door. After passing the medical exam, the next step was having a photo taken for use on identification cards but we were not given those cards. After begin cooped up in that recruiting station all day we were herded on to freight cars for passage to Fushun. The cars were packed with people to the extent that you couldn't stretch out your hand or leg. About 24 hours later, we were let out of the train at Fushan. I think it was in July but I might be off a month either way. It was summer, anyway.

Getting down from that train, we felt so good just to have fresh air to breathe again. Around us we could see guards and special police with their pistols and swords who were to prevent anyone from trying to escape. They put us on trolleys and brought us out here to the mines. I remember very clearly that when we got here, the big houses that we had been promised for our new home turned out to be nothing more than large ramshackle sheds, almost collapsing, with walls of sorghum straw and tarpaper roofs. Each one had about 150 people living in it. There was a 'k'ang' (bed with hot air heat) to sleep on but it wasn't big enough so that we all slept on it like sardines in a can, each lying on his side and unable to turn over during the night without bumping the next person. For a mattress and blanket we used a straw and a brick for a pillow. As for the food, well, conditions were even worse. Breakfast, lunch and supper were all the same: two "wotou" for each. Can you imagine it? Six puny "wotou" per day for men who were doing hard labor twelve hours a day in the mines! Do you know what a "watou" is? It's a king of steamed bread made of very poor flour which is a mixture of ground up acorns, corn flour and the crumbs from pressed bean cake. The ones we had to eat here were about the size of your fist but even then they were hollow inside. The flavor was so bad that I used to lick rock salt when eating them despite my great hunger. On this diet, the body swells up and one is always weak. Once or twice during each week we would get about a cup worth of cooked vegetables and occasionally some thin corn gruel. During the summer we would pick wild vegetables in order to augment this poor diet. Of course, with the winters so severe here, we couldn't get anything extra to eat then and we were considerably better off in the summertime.

'If someone was very sick and bloated, it didn't make any difference'

We worked in the Western open pit mine which you saw today and that I think is the biggest in the world. Because I was only fifteen when we got here from Shandong, they assigned me to work on repairing the trains that were used to carry coal right out from the face of the mine. There were two shifts of 12 hours each, seven days a week. Although we had been promised pay when we were recruited, after we got here we learned that we would not be paid anything for the first two years in order to deduct the cost of our journey here by train from Shandong.

There were several different types of foremen and work bosses in the mine but they were all "dog legs" (collaborators), very cruel to their compatriots with their clubs and whips. We got up before five each morning for our skimpy breakfast. After roll call, we would march out to be at work in the mine by six in the morning. If someone was very sick and bloated, it didn't make any difference. He still had to work his twelve hours. The damned foremen would use their clubs and whips to force anyone to get up and go to work, sick or not. I myself became ill shortly after arriving here. Waking up one morning I

I'm an Air Force officer and this is my sweet chariot. When I visit home people are happy to see me. And proud. They say I'm doing my part in the community by showing the young people and the adults that you really can make it. You really can get your share of the good life.

I also feel good about my position in the Air Force community. I'm a leader there, too. I'm someone the other airmen and women I meet in the service can look to. And it reassures them to know they have a voice in Air Force matters that concern them.

The Air Force needs more leaders... officers ... sincere members ... math majors... science and engineering majors. You might be one of them and the best way to find that out is in Air Force ROTC program. There are two, three, and four-year programs and scholarship and non-scholarship. Joining VPIRG in supporting the rules were Vermont Legal Aid attorney Michael Lipscomb and Mark Stechbart who represented the twenty-three thousand members of the Vermont AFL-CIO. Stechbart cited that similar rules have been adopted in California and have saved the consumer money.

Lipscomb attempted to recount several cases he was handling involving customers who have felt that they have been gypped by auto mechanics. The angry crowd interrupted the attorney charging that he was wasting their time.

In response to the hostile nature of the hearing, Consumer Fraud Chief John Easton has written to the VPIRG director congratulating him for having the "fortitude and courage to testify before the angry crowd."

was so dizzy that I just couldn't get up. Then the foremen came and whipped me until I knew that if I didn't somehow get up and go out to work, they would whip me to death right then and there. If someone was so sick that he just couldn't get up and he wasn't beaten to death, the foremen would make sure that he couldn't get anything to eat and he would soon die anyway. During the first year that we were here, I personally witnessed two miners, probably in their forties, beaten to death by the foremen and a Japanese boss because they were too sick to get up. At the age of fifteen (and my younger brother was only twelve), I saw Chinese foremen beating other Chinese to death in the interest of the Japanese bosses.

In November of 1942, our first winter in the mine, my father got very sick. He was fifty three and probably unable to withstand the hardship as well as we young ones. Anyhow, I and my two brothers went out to work one day in the snow and cold. The temperature that day was below zero. When we returned from another day's work that evening, my father wasn't in the workers' dormitory shed we lived in. Some fellow miners from Laiwu told us that the foremen had driven our father outdoors into the freezing cold and our poor father had been found, frozen to death, less than a hundred meters away. We used willow branches to weave a crude casket together and buried him at the foot of a nearby mountain. It was very hard to dig even a shallow grave in the frozen ground but we didn't want the dogs to bite his body. A half year later my elder brother died in a cave-in at the face of the mine while working there. Another year later, that is to say, 1944, my younger brother got sick and died at the age of 14 from the sickness that swells up the body. That same year or the one before, I'm not too sure, I began to work on the same coal face that killed my elder brother. The women were not used to work in the mining operations but almost all of them died from hunger or sickness.

After two years, I was paid fourteen dollars a month but it was money issued by the company, not real dollars, and they subtracted the cost of my food with the end result that I wasn't paid anything. The following year the Japanese disappeared and we learned that China had defeated Japan. But then the Guomindang (KMT, the regime of Chiang Kai-shek) took over the coal mines but the situation didn't change much. With the KMT administration, it got a little better. We got more to eat but it was only sorghum and corn husks. It was like that for a while and then it got worse again. But the worst of all was that some of the foremen who had mistreated us under the Japs kept their jobs in the mines under the KMT. As far as I know, none of these Chinese were ever tried or punished by the KMT authorities for their treason or their crimes against us miners.

During the era of Japanese imperialism here, we did have some sitdowns and sabotage in the mines. Actually it was very difficult to organize resistance in these conditions. We were so weak and tired all the time, our health so precarious. Nonetheless there was resistance. There were CCP members among the miners but I didn't know who they were until afterwards. I myself did do some sabotage, setting up some tricks which would cause the train cars carrying coal to derail and fall off of bridges. Before liberation, the Eighth Route Army (communist troops) was in the hills about twenty kilometres from here and made some raids on Fushun.

We were liberated by the Eighth Route Army on the first day of November, 1948. I still remember that day so clearly and that date is etched deeply in the hearts of all us miners who were here at the time. We had a vacation for the first time during the period of liberation. The Chinese Communist Party gave each of us ten dollars and 300 catties of rations—wheat, sorghum and millet—as gifts. Of course, after the way we had been treated as slaves and animals, the liberation forces appeared to us as our saviors. All of us were so happy. The pathetic thing was that of the group of twenty that I came with from my home area, only two of us, another miner and I, survived to see liberation. After more rest to regain our strength, the mine was re-opened and we began to participate in the reconstruction of socialist China by raising our coal production. This was done, however, under living and working conditions that were far better than before and that have steadily improved in the years since then.

Look at me and my life! We four men of one family came and after two years I was alone, the only Lu from Wulai here still alive. But now there are seven of us! I have a wife and five sons: the oldest boy is now in the People's Liberation Army and the next two are in middle school and the two youngest in primary school. Before liberation, I never even dreamed that my life could have this happy destiny. My salary after liberation was 27 yuan a month and now it's more than 80 yuan a month. My job now is driving an electric train in the mines. My wife had a job taking care of children in the daycare center and she receives 40 yuan a month salary as well. Our recent and living expenses are very light and stable-and we have a bicycle, radio, record player, sewing machine, etc. at home and look here. I have a watch. You may see, my friends from America, that life does have its sweetness as well as its bitterness."

At this point Mr. Lu began to describe the development of the mining technology and production since 1948 but we were out of time and our bus was waiting to take us back to Shenyang. Thus I had to hurriedly say goodby to Mr. Lu and the other cadres from the mine who had extended their warm hospitality to us. But I have a small photo of Lu Xin-ke, the memory of the pleasure of meeting him and talking with him and a little better understanding of the significance of what happened in China for the millions and millions of disadvantaged Chinese when China stood up and threw off the double yoke of foreign exploitation and a repressive, backward social order. That is not to say that everything is perfect in China or that her millions of people have had no serious problems since liberation or will not have more in the future. But as scholars who study China, as foreigners looking at China with perspectives conditioned by our experiences in a society very different from China, above all as human beings, members of the same human race, I believe it is very important to understand how so many people suffered in the old society in order to better understand the whys and wherefores of China's socialist revolution.

Vermont To Ban The Can

by Jill Campbell and Daniel Adams

A controversial bill banning the sale of all aerosol sprays containing a type of propellant called fluorocarbon will be introduced to Vermont's 1976 Legislative session in the early part of next year. VPIRG has chosen to support this bill and shall soon offer an informative pamphlet concerning the issue. Vermont is the second state to introduce such a bill, as one of similar format was recently passed by the Oregon Legislature, banning all aerosol sprays containing any saturated chlorofluorocarbon compounds from the market. The concern that Oregon, Vermont, and other states have shown over the use of fluorocarbons is a response to the report published in June, 1975, by Drs. F. Sherwood Rowland and Mario Molina, two chemists at the University of California at Irvine. According to that report, the fluorocarbons used in and released from aerosol cans are destroying the ozone layer of the earth's upper atmosphere. It is the predicted results of this ozone destruction, along with many safety hazard and consumer issues, which have irked members of the Vermont Legislature to co-sponsor the proposed bill.

Dr. Rowland's report is supported by the scientific evidence gained through numerous recent studies on the environmental effects of fluorocarbons. Increasing quantities of these compounds, the major ones being trichloromonofluoromithane (F-11) and dichlorodifluoromethane (F-12), the latter commonly known by the Dupont tradename "Freon", have been employed as propellants in consumer products, and are released into the atmosphere when the products are sprayed. Because fluorocarbons are so chemically inert, they are desirable as propellants since they do not react with, nor change, the product. It is also through this inert quality, however, that they are able to float up through the lower atmosphere unchanged. When the molecules reach the stratosphere, they are split by intense ultraviolet radiation to produce free chlorine atoms. The chlorine atoms deplete the ozone layer in the stratosphere by reacting with the Ozone and converting it to ordinary, more stable, oxygen molecules. As depletion of the ozone layer occurs, a greater intensity of ultraviolet radiation will reach the earth's surface. The unfavorable consequences here are manifold, one of the most serious being an almost definite increase in skin cancer. Other problems deal with the fine balance of nature where an increase in ultraviolet radiation could mean even more detrimental effects to those species lacking protective skins (i.e. plankton, etc.). Also a possibility as a result of the chlorine attack is a decrease in the altitude of the ozone layer, probably causing a shift in stratosphere circulation and thus, a change in the weather and climate near the ground. There is no doubt among most scientists that there is a problem. The only thing uncertain is how serious the problem will become.

It is natural that there be opposition to a bill of this nature. In the opposition limelight are the effected members of the aerosol spray industry. Dr. Raymond L. McCarthy of Dupont argued against the banning of fluorocarbons by saying, "There is no concrete evidence to show that the ozone depleting reactions with chlorine take place." Ralph Engel, Executive Director of Chemical Specialties Manufacturers Association wrote, "It is clear that we do not have a current threat to human health." In both examples, the banning of fluorocarbons in aerosols would deal a blow to the respective industries. Both want either a postponement until more concrete evidence is obtained, or no banning at all. But according to the evidence which has been collected, time is one thing we cannot waste. As mentioned earlier, the current threat may not be very indicative of the true extent of the problem. A large percentage of the flurocarbons released have not yet reached the ozone layer and done their damage. As to the lack of definite, concrete evidence proving that there actually is ozone depletion, there is also no proof that the depleting reaction is not taking place. Should concrete evidence be found proving there is no ozone depletion, there is a provision in the bill postponing enforcement of the banning until March 1, 1977. Thus the bill can be retracted should the proper evidence be found.

Both sides have offered many arguments, but the most convincing of them all seem to come from considering what is at stake. As Business Week editorialized Feb. 17, 1975,

> In the case of fluorocarbons, the benefits of spraying underarm deodorant or insect repellant do not come close to offsetting a risk that involves the basic question of keeping the earth liveable.

Some conscious-minded aerosol manufacturers have responded favorably. S.C. Johnson and Son, Inc. of Racine, Wisconsin, presently manufactures nine aerosols. Of those nine only Off contains the detrimental fluorocarbon, and Johnson Wax may soon eliminate that one. Thus there are feasible alternatives.

In addition to the environmental effects, aerosols have proven to be serious safety hazards in the home. Exposure to high temperatures or accidental puncturing can cause the pressurized metal cans to explode, sending dangerous fragments of metal flying. Dizziness, nausea, blurred vision, heart trouble, respiratory problems, and sometimes death, can result from prolonged or repeated inhalation of the toxic substances found in aerosols. Also, if two or more aerosols are sprayed in the same vicinity, the mixture of their chemical clouds can form poisonous fumes. Most aerosol companies make an effort to inform the consumer of the dangers by marking the cans containing toxic of flammable substances, but too often the warning is small and hard to see, and thus goes unnoticed. Thus, as a result of aerosols on the mark unnecessary accidents occur.

Finally, there is the cost. VPIRG will shortly be offering a price list comparing aerosol products and their substitutes, considering the cost per application. In the world of the conscientious consumer, replacing aerosols with some non-aerosol substitute offers a good opportunity to cut back on spending.

There is alot riding against the aerosols, from the saving of money and the prevention of safety hazards in the home, to a problem as large-scale as keeping the earth livable. The state, the communities, and the nation need a starting point from which to launch their fight against aerosols. By passing their bill prohibiting fluorocarbons from the market, Oregon has given us that starting point. It is important for other states like Vermont to follow.

Caution : Heaven Under Construction

(CPS) -- Construction of heaven will begin on Palm Sunday, April 11, 1976 in Springfield, MO.

Gold-brick streets wandering through a 200-acre plot will lead past a fiberglass Jonah-swallowing whale and a 71-foot plexiglass Jesus. Concessionaires dressed like the children of Gideon will walk the streets selling hot dogs and hamburgers.

Promoter Johnnie Hope plans to create a Bible Belt Disneyland by "making the themes of the Bible come alive through modern technology."

Hope estimates that his Bible City will cost $20 million when completed in five years.

That Disneyland touch has been guaranteed by hiring an ex-Disney engineer-architect to take charge of all construction. Among the exhibits already on the drawing board are a Tower of Babel, the Garden of Eden and an imaginary scene from heaven.

"The primary purpose is educational and inspirational," Hope said, "It'll be like an adventure."

Coast To Coast Cities

by Kathleen Brown and Susan Perkins

Travel opportunities in the United States are extraordinary, educational and diverse. Cultures and geographic things rapidly from the Eastern Seaboard to the West Coast. In between, three of the world's largest cities are waiting to be explored by today's traveller.

New York in past years has become one of America's major theater capitals. Broadway brings the West to the east with the opening of William Saroyan's The Time of Your Life. Presented by the Acting Company, it is set in a San Francisco waterfront bar currently running is a Chicago-style vaudevillian musical based on the 1924 melodrama about a Chicago murderess. Also opened is Raisin, a take-off on Lorraine Hansberry's A Raisin in the Sun. The Metropolitan Museum of Art has just put on exhibit a superb collection of Islamic Art whose offered are always the most current and one may learn among many fine concerts in town. Great afternoon entertainment in New York can still be found at the zoo.

New York's biggest drawback is the high cost of transportation, room and food. Those who'd like a taste of city life should be prepared to pay for it.

The heart of the midwest economy far reaching skyscrapers is the booming metropolis of Chicago. One of America's cleanest cities, it is located on Lake Michigan. Sailing, boating and swimming are popular sports in Chicago. Fishing will soon gain popularity as the Lake is newly populated with Pacific and Atlantic Salmon. As for theater, Chicago has just begun a campaign to put the city in the entertainment limelight. Many years ago before Hollywood Chicago was movieland. Now organizations have been funded by Mayor Daley to restore Chicago's Theatre tradition. Chicago's art masterpiece is the Art Institute. Both a school and a museum, it houses the works of many of the most acclaimed painters. The French Impressionist paintings are particularly marvelous.

Mayor Daley sponsors a variety of lakefront festivals, particularly in the summer. Fireworks displays line the shore on the Fourth of July, and in successive days there are a variety of airshows.

Cuisine in Chicago is excellent. Like New York, Chicago has many cultural centers, including a heavy Polish and German population. Chicago, of course, has a Chinatown. Because many persons in these immigration centers speak only their native tongues, one finds many small newspapers, published in different languages.

San Francisco is a city known for its fine seafood, its modern transportation systems, its diverse architecture and its avant-garde life styles.

Fine seafood can be found in the many restaurants in the Fisherman's Wharf area. Plenty of fish is caught every day so that "fresh fish" is always "in season." The Wharf is famous because it is so picturesque with its fishing fleets and ports.

One can arrive in San Francisco in its fairly new International Airport. The airport only 20 years old, has overseas, national and regional flights coming and going. There are also fine railways in the city. There are 4 class-one railways connecting to seven transcontinental routes serving San Francisco's visitors. The commuters, as an alternate to driving in, can take the 3-year-old Bay Area Rapid Transit. This is a freeway of approximately of elevated and sub-lines linking the big city with the surrounding cities.

San Francisco is divided into several "quarters" which may account for its varying life styles. There is a Latin Quarter which was noted for its informal nightclubs in the 50's and 60's. The patrons of these nightclubs were categorized as beatniks and hippies. Adding to these categories are many students as San Francisco has several universities and colleges.

The most famous "quarter" is Chinatown. It brings a distinct influence of the east to San Francisco since it is the largest Chinese settlement outside the orient. It is truly an amazing place to visit. In 1969, a beautiful gateway to Chinatown was completed. Its ornamentation was contributed by Taiwan artists as a gift from the Republic of China.

San Francisco is a town distinguished in its geographic makeup by its steep hills. The famous cable cars enable one to travel up and down the hills easily. They also serve to connect the quarters.

Speaking of connections brings to mind the Golden Gate Bridge. One of the most beautiful bridges in the world, the Golden Gate lies across the San Francisco Bay and the Pacific Ocean. It has an 8-mile span.

There are many forms of recreation to be found in this diversified city. The San Francisco opera, symphony and ballet companies are of national stature. There are several museums and many parks.

The climate of the city is mild and cool as it's a hand-locked harbor. Its annual temperature is 56.8 degrees F which makes it a very pleasant city to visit... or to live in.

The Mother
Author To Visit UVM

"Who built the Seven Gates of Thebes? Who, on the other hand, cleaned Einstein's house? Who bore Tolstoi's children? Who is Nixon's maid? Who protected Thomas Mann from the public so that he could write? Who is waiting on the bricklayers? Who would Einstein have been had he given birth to four children and lived and worked without cleaning ladies, wet-nurses, governesses, and cooks? Nursery schools are a substitute, but they do not produce mothers."

These words are taken from the most recent, perhaps the most controversial, and certainly the most talked about novel, The Mother, by the young German writer Karin Struck, who will be speaking at UVM on Saturday, November 15.

The 28-year-old Ms. Struck is at the center of the most exciting current literary news from Germany and of the heated discussion of Feminism in that country and for good reasons. Her unquestionable literary talent has been clearly demonstrated in her two published novels: Class Love, Klassenliebe (1973) and The Mother/Die Mutter (1975) both of which are on the register of one of the most distinguished literary publishers in Germany Suhrkamp). Also, her very original analyses of women's role in society today, whether German or other, have been fruit for much usually not-so-impartial debate in the German news media. She has been praised by many fellow writers, including the noted Heinrich Boell (Nobel Prize for Literature, 1972.) And she has written a number of sharp-tongued articles on the Feminist Movement and other topical questions for a nationally circulated German news-magazine.

Ms. Strunk, the devoted mother of two children, clearly sides with women in her writings, but not simply with the Feminists and against men. She insists on her own deep-cutting interpretation of the woman's basic role, her basic rights, her often not-so-glamorous history and her most deep-felt longings. Shit is a polemical, critical, but very honest writer. Most interesting in her approach to these questions, is the way Ms. Struck personalizes them in her books. For example, in The Mother, is her very penetrating summary of the most basic feelings of a woman in "a man's world": "I want to assert my own basic self-identity, and, at the same time, my greatest longing is to be a mother, to bear children from my womb, to be a great sensual mother; I want to be a total person, that's all."

Ms. Struck's visit to UVM and her address here are being sponsored by the Dept. of German and Russian, the Continuing Education Division, and by the Goethe-Institut of Boston, Mass. She will speak on November 15 at 2:00 p.m. in Dewey Lounge (Old Mill) on "The Figure of the Mother in Literature." (No admission charge) Ms. Struck will speak in German, but an interpreter will be present to assist her in answering questions in English from the audience. The general public is cordially invited to attend. (No admission charge.)

A Giraffe Story

Once upon a time, there was a lazy giraffe. His name was Terry. He was always sticking his neck into things. He did this because he was curious. He was curious about other living things. But what he liked most about sticking his neck into things was stealing people's lunches. He liked stealing people's lunches because he would get hungry very fast. He would get very hungry very fast because he was always running around.

Terry was always running around because he was an escapee from the zoo. When the zookeeper would spot him, he would always chase him. So Terry was always on the run.

One time the zookeeper chased him right through the city and into the zoo. He ran right into the zookeeper's office, because Terry knew the zookeeper would never look for him in there. And Terry figured out how to lock the door. So that night the zookeeper never got in. Terry's neck was too big for the room so he stood in the staircase all night. When the zookeeper had gone home after locking up the zoo, Terry got out and let out a few of the other animals. He let them out too because he was getting lonely. He was also very tired of getting chased around, and he thought that the other animals would get chased more because they were wilder than him. He especially let the tigers and the lions out.

One of the tigers climbed up and jumped over the brick fence. A lion copied him. Before morning, all the other animals were out and running around all over the place.

At the other end of town there was a parade. The lions and tigers and monkeys and all the other animals were marching in the street along with the parade. The people thought that they were tame and with the parade. Nobody knew that they were wild and had escaped from the zoo.

The zookeeper was watching the parade down the street about a mile or so. When the animals marched by him, he recognized them. He recognized them because of the special marking that they had around their necks. He started telling everybody that they were wild animals and no one believed him. So he called everybody that worked at the zoo and told them to get to the parade and fast. He told them that all the animals in the zoo had escaped and were marching with the parade. He wanted them to help him capture them.

They came. At the end of ten minutes, they had all the animals captured and locked in their cages. The zookeeper said to his employees that their dream had come true they had finally captured the giraffe.

In a couple of days, Terry became adjusted to living there. He never had to run again, and he even got fed baloney sandwiches which were his favorites. And he lived happily ever after.

Don't GetRipped Off! Count Your Aspirin

by Davé Milligan

Have you ever, just for the hell of it, counted the number of aspirin in a bottle claiming to contain, let us say, one hundred tablets, and found the actual number to be more or less, but not really one

Have you ever wondered if a package of two-hundred and fifty napkins really contained two-hundred and fifty?

I recently purchased two boxes of wooden toothpicks, each box claiming to contain two-hundred and fifty contained two-hundred and forty-seven, the other box contained two-hundred and sixty-two.

When the item being discussed is simply a box of toothpicks costing sixteen cents, no one really gets upset that the number of the items being sold is not in reality that number. But what if the item being sold is something quite valuable, like an ounce of gold? Wouldn't you want that ounce to be a very accurate ounce?

If a manufacturer or retailer is consistently screwing the consumer, something should be done about it and you as consumers are not powerless.

Write to the Vermont Consumer Fraud Division, the Federal Trade Commission, VPIRG. For more information or addresses, visit or call Consumer Information Clearinghouse, 211 Terrill Hall, Extension Service, UVM, Tel. 656-3280 or 656-3281, but do something!

If a package makes claims as to contents, these claims must be accurate. You should get what you are told you're getting, no more or less.

Don't let the apparent size of a package deceive you. One package may appear to be larger than another, and yet contain an equal or even lesser amount of an item.

Learn what Unit Pricing is and use it. Whether you use it or not, you still pay for it.

THE PAULISTS ARE HELPING TO UNITE THE UNITED STATES!

Our nation, united in goal and ideal . . . but divided in so many ways.

Divided by doubts, prejudices, fears, violence, injustic, poverty.

The Paulists have been bringing Americans together for over a century now, trying to overcome the barricades men erect between each other. We work to unite believer to believer, believer to nonbeliever, man to man. As Catholics and Americans, we know unity is worth a lot—worth giving our lives to bring about.

We do this everyday through the communication arts—books, publications, television and radio—on college campuses, in parishes, in missions in the U.S., in downtown centers, in working with young and old.

If you would like to help us in our venture of healing American wounds with the Gospel of Christ as a Paulist priest, mail the coupon below for information.

Bolton Names New Ski School Director

Hermann Muckenschnabl, formes alpine ski coach for Dartmouth College, has just returned to Vermont to begin his new position as the Ski School Director for the Bolton Valley Resort in Bolton, Vermont. Since the spring he has been the Director of the ski school at the Perisher Valley Ski Area, Australia's largest ski resort.

The widely known Austrian-born instructor and racer has been a leading figure in upgrading alpine skiing in the East. During Muckenschnabl's six-year coach & career at Dartmouth College, the team was a three-time winner of the Eastern Inter-Collegiate Ski Championships.

Muckenschnabl plans to continue the GLM method of teaching at Bolton Valley and will also be starting a special ski school for children aged 4-6 years, a Junior racing team for ages 8-13 years and a weekly area race for skiers on every level.

"We're really excited to have a person of Hermann's caliber in charge of the Bolton Valley Ski School," said Ralph DesLauriers, president of Bolton Valley Corporation. "Our learn to ski program has always been a key part of our Resort. Hermann's dedication and personality will really fit in well with our set-up of having most of our ski-week vacationers staying right here at the mountain."

During the sixties, Muckenschnabl was the ski coach at the University of Vermont and also an instructor for the Mt. Mansfield Corporation in Stowe, Vermont. He has also coached the Australian National Ski Team in Fall Creek, Victoria and has taught at the Tredbo Ski Area, in New South Wales, Australia. In addition, he has also directed the ski school at Smiggins Ski Bowl, New South Wales.

Friends Of UVM Hockey

Friends of UVM Hockey is an organization whose concern is to render support for the UVM hockey program. With a membership of over 200 fans, including many community people, it is constantly looking for new student members to contribute to the group. The Friends are presently constructing an electronic scoreboard similar to those used in the NHL. They have taken on the responsibility of selling programs and souvenirs at the games.

This fall the Friends sponsored the testimonial dinner for Coach Cross on November 9 and the upcoming match with McGill University this Sunday the 16th at 1:30. But the above functions would not occur if it weren't for the players. This is where you as a member can play an active part by giving to the scholarship fund. This year you will be seeing someone on the ice who is receiving a scholarship from the Friends.

Being a member does not assure you of a seat at every game, but it does assure you of playing an active part in the continuance of our hockey program. The membership fee for students is only $2.00. Membership forms may be picked up at the student information table in Billings or the Athletic office at Patrick gym. Cards and dues should be sent to the Friends, c/o Patrick Gym. Meetings are held the first and third Tuesday of each month, at 7:30 in the Athletic Hall of Fame room of the gym.

UVM Hockey Meets McGill Sunday

by Norm Robinson

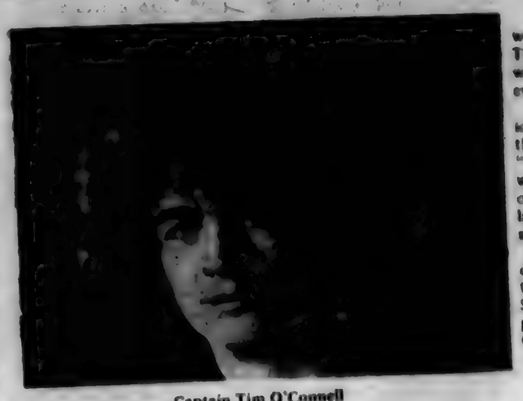
It hardly seems like hockey weather, with temperatures in the 50's and 60's and bright, sunny days. Yet hockey time is rolling around again and the University of Vermont hockey team is tuning up for its second Division I season.

In preparation for the first games with St. Louis on the 21st and 23rd, the hockey Catamounts meet McGill University this Sunday, the 16th, at 1:30. McGill, which starts their season earlier than Vermont is currently 2–1. Their only loss came to Concordia, which will be one of UVM's opponents in the North Country Thanksgiving Tournament.

There are 3,000 tickets on sale for the McGill game and with no reserved seats it will give alot of fans who don't ordinarily get a chance to see the Cats in action such a chance. Tickets are on sale at the Patrick Gym at the price of $2.00 for adults and $1.00 for students.

The Cats are in their third week of practice and are rounding into form nicely. "We're anxious to play McGill," says coach Jim Cross. "We've been playing against ourselves and the kids need a change."

"It couldn't come at a better time. The kids know each others moves and are anticipating them too much. Different competition is just what we need before we go out West to meet St. Louis."



Captain Tim O'Connell

The Cats plan to skate four lines. Tim O'Connell will center Randy Koch and Bill Reber. On the second line it will be Michel Lebeau and Ben Lord playing wings and Andy Halford taking the faceoffs.

The other two lines will see Bill Spence centering newcomers Jim Duffy and Ed Hill while Tom Colby will be playing between Ben Rocheleau and freshman Gordie MacFarlane. Gary Wright will be the utility forward.

The defensive pairings show senior Ken Yeates teaming with Greg Wilke; John Glynne and Joey Oslin will play together; Bill McAlduff will be with Chuck Ross and Dana Hooper with Chuck Stahlin.

In the nets it will once again be Tom McNamara and Peter Reynolds along with Paul Donovan.

"All three goalies have looked great so far, we're o.k. there," remarked Cross.

"Tom will start against McGill, and we also plan to use all four sets of defensemen. We'll use six for the first two periods and after the second we'll move in the other two. This is a scrimmage and we want to get a good look at everyone."

Warm days have made the ice soft, but it's been a help to the Cats according to Cross. "The ice was slow after those warm days but it was good for our legs. It gets you in shape a little quicker skating on the slow ice."

The Cats are nearly ready, so don't miss a great chance to see them in action. Don't forget Sunday, November 16 at 1:30 p.m. McGill vs UVM at Gutterson Field House.

Hockey Preseason

Like the basketball team, Jim Cross' skaters will take its show on the road, playing an intra-squad game November 14 at the new Rutland Indoor Rink beginning at 6:30 p.m. Two nights later (November 16), the Catamount icemen play McGill in a pre-season exhibition game beginning at 1:30 p.m. at the Gutterson Fieldhouse. Tickets for the McGill-Vermont game are available at the Patrick Gym (Room 206). Vermont opens at St. Louis with a two-game set, November 21 and 23.

Cochran Ski Area To Have Racing Clinic

The Cochran's Ski area is offering a ski racing clinic, December 26 through December 31. This clinic is open to anyone who is interested in ski racing at any level. The outstanding coaching staff is interested in working with skiers who either do not have previous racing experience and who want to begin, or use race training as a means of improving their technique. The staff is certainly well qualified to work with the best ski racers.

Bob Cochran at Wengen in 1973 World Cup.

Mickey Cochran will be directing the staff which includes his two eldest daughters, Marilyn and Barbara, and Dick Farrell. Mickey is now technical advisor to the UVM Alpine Ski Team. For several years, he coached our Alpine Team to many honors including a national slalom title. In 1974 he was coach of the US Ski Team.

Marilyn and Barbara are both former U.S. Ski Team members and veterans of several World Cup seasons. Together for many years, they compiled most of the World Cup points received by US women. In 1969 Marilyn won the World Cup in Grand Slalom. At the 1970 World Championships, both women won FIS medals. And Barbara won the slalom in 1972 Olympics. Last year Barbara coached the UVM Women's Team; this year her older sister, Marilyn, has the job.

Dick Farrell is a former UVM skier from the days when the team first went to the national championships. For the past few years, Dick has coaching top eastern and national skiers as well as teaching Phys. Ed.

Although Cochran's ski area can't host a large vertical drop, it is one of the best training areas in the world. It is possible to run 800 slalom gates per hour – a rate unequalled anywhere. If that doesn't convince you of the hill's worth as a training site, consider the outstanding race records of the kids who've trained there.

The cost for the six days of training from 10 a.m. – 4 p.m. every day is $45.00. This price includes the cost of the lift ticket, normally $3 per day. You're on your own for lunch.

When you consider what is offered, especially keeping in mind the excellence of the coaching staff and their willingness to work with beginning racers, you must conclude they are offering a much needed service to UVM and the community. Interested people should call the Cochran's at 434-2479.

"A Guy Named Cross"

by Norm Robinson

The evening was about "A Guy Named Cross." This past Sunday, coach Jim Cross of the UVM hockey team was honored at the Patrick Gym before relatives, friends, former and current hockey players and hockey fans. The affair was put on by the Friends of UVM Hockey and they must be congratulated for a tremendous job.

The highlight of the affair was the unveiling of former UVM hockey star Bill Koch's new book: A Guy Named Cross, A Place called Vermont.

"I knew Bill was writing a book but I thought it was on the whole college scene and was years away," said Cross.

Many tributes were paid to Cross. Dr. Thomas Trainer remarked, "Jim is a representative of a small group of educators who have had an impact on the people they are associated with."

Governor Thomas Salmon was also present and cited Cross's deep interest in youth hockey. He also proclaimed Sunday, November 9, 1975 as

James M. Cross Appreciation Day.

Speaking for the parents, Charlie Ross complimented UVM's coach very highly. "Thanks to Jim Cross, every Vermont hockey player has an opportunity to play for a national power."

"Even more satisfying is that even if you don't make the team you are a part of a tremendous hockey community," added Ross.

Marshall Stevenson, UVM's first hockey captain and Jack Semler, the head hockey coach at Princeton and former UVM player also spoke.

Others included Athletic Director Dennis Lambert, former Athletic Director Ed Donnelly, and assistant coach George Kriener. Kriener, "a former player remembered it this way, "Cross made it fun. He wanted a hundred percent and he made it a very special time. They were the best four years of my life."

This year's captain, Tim O'Connell, said "I just wish more players had a chance to play for him."

Bill Koch stunned Dr. Andrews with the announcement that the book was dedicated to him.

Dr. Andrews remembered different instances where Cross showed, "how to win with grace and lose with dignity. How we play the game is how we win."

In particular he spoke of the Army game in 1972. Army was determined to play dirty but Vermont refused to retaliate with the same cheap shots. A symbol of Cross-style of play.

The Coach received several standing ovations, and he spoke on several subjects. "The Cross-Country Finishes Sixth In N.E.

On Saturday November 8 the UVM Cross Country Team ran in the 63rd Annual New England Championship race in Franklin Park, Boston. The Cats placed sixth out of the more than 35 teams entered, their highest finish since 1970 when they took fifth place.

Head Coach Bill Nedde termed the race "a fantastic team performance for the Cats, one of the highest achievements of my coaching career." Captain Lynn Capen led the Vermont scoring placing 18th, and making the All-New England Team. This was truly a great effort, since Lynn ran with the top runners from the track powers of New England. His time for the five mile course was 25:02.

Dave Milligan finished 2nd for Vermont in 27th place, followed by Peter Weith in the 32nd spot. These two performances, out of a field of over 250 runners helped to anchor Vermont's high finish. Bob Stoehr, in his strongest showing of the season placed 59th, and Howdy Russell ran in the 78th spot to round out the Vermont scoring. Dave Elliot placed 94th, and Dave Raner ran 123rd.

The course was soft and wet from the previous night's rain, slowing down times of the whole field. The Cats also drew a poor starting position, off to one side, but overcame this deficiency by generally running hard and moving up through the first two miles.

Providence College, paced by winner Mike O'Shea and runner-up John Tracy, edged Northeastern for the team title 42-45. Massachusetts placed third with 146 points.

Results (Top Ten Teams)

1. Providence – 42

On Saturday, November 15, the Cats will travel to Van Cortland Park, New York City to compete in the ICAA Championships, a qualifying meet for the nationals.

Quebec Selects Nip UVM Booters 1-0

It was a game that meant nothing as far as records and won-loss marks were concerned, yet, it was important to the UVM Soccer Catamounts. Last Sunday, the Cats played host to the Quebec Selects, a touring Canadian Soccer Team, and lost a tough physical game, 1-0.

Vermont was preparing for the upcoming NCAA regional tournament, and in what is becoming a UVM tradition, came out playing like it was a title game, even though it was only a scrimmage.

The only goal of the game was scored in the second half at the 9:12 mark by Nick Courage.

Courage's tally came from close in when he got a shot off to Taft's left. The UVM goaltender got a hand on the ball, but it careened into the right corner of the net.

Although the Cats couldn't chalk up a win, they certainly weren't embarrassed. Vermont had a 17-14 shot edge as well as an 8-6 margin in corner kicks.

The Selects' goalie, Tino Lettieri, was undoubtedly the difference in the game. Mark Socinski, took a direct shot from 40 feet out, only to have Lettieri make a diving stop early in the first period. John Koerner had a direct kick midway through the second period that was also stopped by the Selects' goalie.

The Catamounts had numerous chances throughout the game as they carried the play to the more experienced team. Bruce Norton just missed a head shot after a feed from Tim Beal. John Koerner saw an early shot slip by the right post, and as the first half drew to a close, another Vermont shot hit the cross bar.

The game was a tremendously physical style due mainly to the fact that more rough play is allowed in the Canadian division. In fact, Egor Bachner of the Selects was ejected from the game after he intentionally kicked Catamount fullback Carl Christensen after fighting for the ball.

The game was a good test for the Cats as they await the NCAA tournament.

National Coaches Conference At UVM

The National Association for Girls and Women in Sports will sponsor the National Coaches Conference at the University of Vermont, November 14-16.

The conference, one of four regional programs, is designed to provide information on intermediate and advanced coaching techniques, sports psychology and athletic program administration as it relates to girls and women's athletics. Programs will emphasize basketball, track and field and athletic training and conditioning.

The sessions in track and field will be in field events, cross country running, middle and long distance events, motivation and meet psychology. Offering instruction in these areas include Jeff Johnson, head coach of the Exeter, N.H. Seacoast Striders; Aldo Scandurra, coach and former member of the International Olympic Committee and Ed Kusiak, head coach of track and field at UVM. Also joining this group will be Dr. Rob McGregor of the New England Deaconess Hospital in Boston. Dr. McGregor is a specialist in foot problems, and has worked with many runners throughout the country.

Conducting sessions in basketball will be Ms. Lucille Kyvallos, head coach at Queens College, Queens, N.Y. and Ms. Louise O'Neal, head coach at Southern Connecticut State College. Their sessions will touch upon intermediate and advanced skills, offensive and defensive strategy and game psychology. Team members from both colleges will accompany their coaches to serve as demonstrators for the sessions.

UVM's head trainer, Roger Bryant, will handle the athletic training and conditioning sessions and will be joined by Elwood "Ike" Isley, UVM's assistant athletic trainer and Ms. Libbie Payne, a trainer at the State University of New York (SUNY) at Brockport. Their emphasis will be conditioning for competition and prevention and treatment of injuries.

In addition to the activity sessions, there will be an all-conference banquet November 15, with Dr. Sandra Scott of the New York State Public High School Athletic Association as the guest speaker. Dr. Scott's topic will be "The Non-graded Athletic Curriculum."

Registration materials may be obtained from Ms. Val Gardner, RFD 4, 36 Mallets Bay Avenue, Winooski, Vt., 05404, and will include housing and travel information. Registration will be conducted Nov 14 from 11 a.m. to 5 p.m. in the Roy L. Patrick Gymnasium lobby. For further information, contact Maggi Hayes, Conference Director, Southwick Building, University of Vermont, Burlington, Vt. 05401.

RPI To Play Vermont In Basketball

Troy, N.Y. – The Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute varsity basketball team will play a preseason scrimmage versus the University of Vermont on November 13 at Bellows Falls Union High School in Bellows Falls, Vermont.

The game will get underway at 7:30 p.m. The game will run three 20-minute halves in length.

UVM Gymnasts Dominate

This past weekend, the UVM Men's Gymnastic team gave a strong performance in the Vermont Open Gymnastic Meet. A total of about 17 individuals competed in the six events which were floor exercise, pommel, horse, rings parallel bars, high bar, and vaulting. UVM Team members dominated the competition by taking the majority of winning places. Two firsts, six seconds, and three thirds were won in the course of the meet. The meet, held here in Burlington, was sponsored by the Parks and Recreation Department and was open to all High school and University level entrants. The meet differed slightly from conventional intercollegiate contests with respect to point accummulation. No team scores were tallied as is the usual procedure during tournaments. Instead, team members were entered as individual contestants, and scores were totaled accordingly.

The meet provided a good preseason warm-up for this weekend, November 15, when the team officially starts its season against the Plattsburgh State Gymnastic team. The meet, held in Plattsburgh, will begin at 1 p.m.

WRUV-AM Winter Sports

WRUV-AM begins another season covering UVM winter sports this Sunday when the Cats host McGill at 1:30 p.m. at the Gutterson Field House. The game is being held to raise money for the Friends of UVM hockey. Returning for another year on WRUV will be broadcasters Bill Newell and Chris Wallace. Try to attend the game to help the Friends, but if you can't make it, listen at 1:15 p.m. for Chris Wallace's Pre-game show.

UVM Skaters Picked 4th

The University of Vermont Skating Catamounts have been picked as fourth place finishers in this year's first poll by the Intercollegiate Hockey Newsletter.

The top spot went to defending champion Boston University, who received 22 first place votes. The Terriers outdistanced Harvard for first place by a 215-157 point spread. In third spot behind Harvard was the Big Red from Cornell with 139 points.

The Cats gathered 118 points for fourth place.

Rounding out the top ten were as follows: New Hampshire, Brown, Providence, Boston College, Clarkson, and St. Lawrence. The top eight teams at the end of the season will meet in post season tournament play.

Madonna Ski Sale

The 10th Annual Madonna Ski Sale will be held November 14, 15, 16, at the Taft's Corners Shopping Center in Williston, at the Junctions of Routes 2 and 2A.

Equipment may be brought in Friday the 14th from 9 - 9. The sale will begin on Friday at 4 and continue until 9 p.m. Buying will continue on Saturday the 15th from 9 - 5, and Sunday from 10 - 12. Money or equipment should be picked up on Sunday from 12 - 5.

There should be plenty of Alpine equipment, and last year there was quite a lot of new equipment, both skis and boots, and there were quite a few very nice items of ski clothing. This is a good time to sell the youngsters' outgrown equipment and clothing and buy more. There is usually a good selection of boots and equipment for the beginning skier. We hope to have some used Cross Country equipment as well.

Please no skis over 205 cm and only small children's lace boots as there is very little call for this equipment.

Ski Racing

Anyone interested in a series of discussions on ski racing technique call 656-3074 and leave your name, etc. These talks would start at a very basic level and cover alpine ski racing beginning with elementary explanations on the courses (what a gate is and the difference between slalom, giant slalom and downhill) and end with some on snow practice.

Dorm Rooms To Be Available

The Office of Residential Life has announced that there will be some rooms available on campus for the second semester.

Director Steven Peterson says that the residence halls will lose some students at the end of this semester due to graduation, transfers and so forth.

In the past, because of the likelihood that there would not be enough rooms on campus to house all those requesting on-campus accommodations, the residence life staff has not attempted to maintain a waiting list. (The only people required to live on campus are freshmen). About 50 freshmen will be admitted in January, Dr. Peterson says, but there will still be some rooms available.

Normal attrition over the semester has ranged from 100 to 150 in the past, and that is anticipated to hold this semester, he says.

"We would like currently enrolled students, whom we've been unable to accommodate in the past, to have the first opportunity to let us know if they are interested in on-campus housing for the spring semester," he says.

"This time we may be able to place them."

Vermont Children's Mag

Come help begin The Vermont Children's Magazine's second year! Artists, writers, people interested in publishing, accounting majors, etc. are needed. Others are welcome. Election of officers, and writing a charter are planned. Friday, November 21st, from 4 - 7 p.m., in Room 409 Waterman Building. Volunteer your time and talents!!!

Schedule The Van

Scheduling for the S.A. OVP Van will be done by Jim Miller, Van Coordinator (656-2062), during the following hours.

Monday 3:00 to 5:00; Tuesday 1:00 to 5:00; Wednesday 4:00 to 5:00; Thursday 10:00 to 12:00, 1:00 to 5:00; and Friday 1:00 to 5:00.

'Toys For Tots'

"Toys for Tots" is run by Kappa Alpha Theta sorority and Sigma Phi fraternity, in conjunction with the Salvation Army.

We need students to bring back old toys from home over Thanksgiving. Drop-off places or pick-ups will be announced in early December. Last year we collected and distributed over 500 toys to Burlington-area underprivileged children. If you have any questions, call Cathy Chamberlin or Gayle Gayland at 864-9051.

Gay Dance Coming

The UVM Gay Student Union will hold a Gay dance at 9:00 p.m. on Saturday, December 6 at Southwick Hall on the Redstone Campus. Gay dances are held mainly to provide a relaxed social setting for Gay women and men where they can dance together comfortably, as Burlington offers extremely limited social opportunities for Gay people. Attendance is by no means closed to non-Gay people, and sympathetic straight people have attended past dances. Attendance at previous dances has ranged anywhere from 80 to 150 people. Admission is one dollar by donation to cover expenses, and refreshments will be provided.

Sex Information Service

The Student Sex Information Service, recently recognized as an S.A. organization, is distributing a questionnaire in an attempt to gain information on Burlington area agencies that deal with sexuality and related problems.

The gathering of such information is the first step in instituting a Student Sex Information Service on the UVM Campus. With enough student support, it would become a viable on-campus referral and information service – the place one would go first to gain knowledge as to where to go next. Your honest opinions and past experiences will be invaluable in helping us achieve this goal.

All those interested in filling out the questionnaire should pick one up at the Student Association Office, Billings Center. Your help will be greatly appreciated.

Treasurer's Post

Applications are now being accepted for the position of Student Association Treasurer, which will become vacant on January 1, 1976.

Responsibilities include chairing the S.A. Finance Committee, which is responsible for allocating funds to various S.A. recognized organizations.

Interested students may obtain more information concerning this time-consuming and important position by contacting Donna Vershay, S.A. Treasurer, at the S.A. Office in Billings Center at Ext. 2053.

Special Showing

This week's special showing at Century Plaza (Dorset Street) on Thursday at 4:00 p.m. is Hearts of the West. This new film has not yet played in Burlington.

Tickets cost $1 and are available at the door or at the main office at Pomeroy Hall.

The workshop is geared to serve all educators and outdoor leaders within the state in utilizing the methodology of environmental education in their curriculums, programs and year-round activities.

The workshop will involve exhibits, audio-visual presentations, practical experiences and hand-out materials presented by educational authorities and commercial organizations from throughout the state. The major areas of Environmental Education will be covered by the presentations, including outdoor pursuits, humanities, social studies, science, math, music and art, curriculum intergration, school site development, natural resource development and international environmental educational programs. The program will run from 10:00 a.m. to 4:00 p.m. on Saturday, December 6, with a luncheon at 12:00 presenting Dr. Kirk, Dr. Carl Reidel of the Environmental Studies Program of the University of Vermont, Dean Corrigan of the College of Education at the University, and Charles Christensen of the Department of Physical Education at the University.

There is no registration fee, and the luncheon will cost $2.50. A program schedule of events and registration materials will be available to all interested persons. Pre-registration is advised for those interested in the luncheon and specific activity sessions listed in the program. Further information and registration materials can be received by contacting Alan V. Hall, Recreation Coordinator, Patrick Gymnasium, UVM, or phoning Dr. Robert Gobin's office – 656-3070.

Medieval Program Schedule

The Medieval-Renaissance Studies Program of the Living/Learning Center offers throughout the academic year a wide assortment of academic and social events. The Program, now in its second year, has already achieved a measure of national prominence, as well as recognition at the university, for its sponsorship of such activities as its annual summer travel-study program in Assisi, Italy and its Spring Medieval Fair.

Future events planned for this academic year include: a three day symposium in early December offered by Fr. Jean LeClercq, the world's foremost authority on medieval monasticism; a two day seminar in March on 'The Medieval Origins of England's Irish Problems', featuring Professor Dennis Cashman of Quinnipiac College, Connecticut; a three day colloquium in mid-April on 'Women in the Middle Ages' conducted by Professors Emily Coleman (University of Pittsburgh) and Jo Ann McNamara (Hunter College), and a two day seminar on King Richard III in late April offered by Professor Charles Wood of Dartmouth. In addition, films will be shown, lectures by program faculty offered, and social-cultural events of various sorts held, on a regular basis. The final, culminating event will be the May Day Medieval Fair.

The Program wishes to include as many interested persons as possible from both the university and the community at large, in its activities. It therefore invites all interested persons to place their names on its mailing list to receive its irregular but frequent announcements and other mailings. Such persons should drop a note to Professor Alfred J. Andrea, Department of History, UVM.

Medieval Suite Opening

One vacancy will exist spring semester in the Medieval/Renaissance Program suites at the Living/Learning Center.

Any student interested in filling this vacancy should contact Professor James Howe in the English Department, 309 Old Mill.

The Exchange

by Julie A. Bushey
Alice D. Outwater
Counseling & Testing

This week, The Exchange is delighted to say that the responses coming in are becoming larger in number. We hope that as the academic year goes on, we will be able to answer all replies. It would be much easier to answer the responses if a telephone number is given, as it is sometimes impossible to find people by name only.

One complaint that was raised this week is "Why are there so many lights left on in the dorms? Why don't people shut off the lights when they are through using them? So many times I've walked by the telephone areas and seen the lights on when no one was using the phones. Also walking by people's rooms which have many lights on and no one in the rooms." Perhaps people are forgetful or careless. When a light is on that shouldn't be, either shut it off or inform the owner that it shouldn't be on when it's not being used. It's a sure way of conserving energy and maybe saving UVM money. The amount saved may not be all that much, but every little bit would help.

Another problem brought to our attention is "When I first came here, I really enjoyed meeting new people and felt great about being away from home for the first time. All the people seemed so friendly. All of that has changed now. Not just within the dorms, but throughout the whole University. It seems like no one is interested in making new friends anymore. I've made plenty of friends, but not being able to just walk up to someone and say "How's it going" kind of gets to me. I hope people haven't lost their social spirit." There surely are others in your place. Many have found an outlet through joining one of the many clubs on campus. Such a club would be the Outing Club International. Check the Billings board for a club to suit your taste.

We hope to receive more suggestions, gripes, complaints, and problems as the year goes on, so keep them coming in. Drop them in the boxes at: Jeanne Mance, Billings, Converse, Simpson, Wright, and Harris, or call x2068.

4. The artwork should be submitted on heavy stock paper.

5. The artwork need not mention ARIEL 1976.

6. Entries must be clearly marked on the reverse side with the entrant's name, address, and phone number.

S.A. Depends on Students

Last semester's dissolution of the SA Senate resulted from student apathy and frustration with SA inaction. The feeling of nonaccomplishment and nonparticipation by SA representitives was kept in mind when the new constitution was drawn up. A unique form of student government was presented to the students for approval during the last week of September and subsequently was passed.

Will the new SA succeed where the old one failed? That will depend entirely on the student's interest and concern for their own Student Association. Apathy certainly does not exist in the current SA. The committee structure has dispersed responsibility so that all members can participate. SA representatives have not only fulfilled their duties, but pursued them with a zeal, not commonly associated with UVM student government.

Today is the day that students at large have a responsibility to fulfill. Proposals will be voted upon and discussed at the General Town Assembly. This is the forum for students to speak out on issues concerning them. If students do not participate in the Town Assembly, they will have failed to meet the challenge that student leaders have set - involvement with student affairs.

It is becoming increasingly essential for students to speak for themselves, because no one else will. The bulk of the faculty is concerned with job security and pay raises, while the administration is preoccupied with financial matters. We as students are understandably concerned about the quality of education at UVM and the tuition hikes we have to pay for that education, but unless we do something constructive about it, we will only become a doormat for others with interest different from our own to walk on.

More Information

To the Editor:

John McDonald, what are you trying to say? Your article "Pill Retains Popularity" in the November 6th Cynic left us standing in a sea of confusing and horrifying statistics about methods of contraception for women, and your concluding sentence, "perhaps you contraceptive users should take a closer look at your own cases," left us dangling on an inconclusive limb.

Two of your points were certainly well taken: first, that women must adjust their methods of contraception to their own individual needs, and second, that the pill is still considered 98% effective.

In your introductory paragraph, you state, "all of you, male or female, have probably experienced by now the problems encountered when one is not 'protected'." We assumed from this rather broad statement that you intended to proceed with information on contraceptives for both men and women. But we were wrong. What follows is a statistical account of the popularity of the pill and other contraceptive devices designed for women, with no mention of male contraceptives.

If we must read the unpleasant statistics, that, of a group of 600,000 women using the IUD, 35,000 will become pregnant and 19 will die, and, of women using the pill, 20,000 will become pregnant and 35 will die, we would also like to read about other alternatives to the pill or the IUD, like male contraceptives. If mention of male contraceptives is inconvenient, at least give us the pleasure of straightening out some of your statistics. When you quote a sex counselor as saying, "pill users have dropped from about 70% to 65% over the past three years," we wonder, 70% to 65% of whom?

We appreciate your desire to publicize the disadvantages of the pill and other contraceptive methods for women, but give us the advantages too, unless you can give us some alternatives. We all need to know more about contraceptives, and there is always new and interesting information on the subject. So keep writing, but keep track of who you are writing about, and what you are trying to say.

To the Editor:

It has come to our attention that many students in this University are misinformed about the way in which Concert Bureau operates. It seems that these students are making factual claims (based more on fiction than fact) about members of the Concert Bureau and the way in which these members run concerts here at the University.

As members of Concert Bureau, we would like to inform these students who have complaints or questions about concerts or the Concert Bureau that we are available and more than willing to speak with them. We want everyone to speak with us. We want you to realize the work and effort that goes into providing a concert for the student body. We are willing to listen to you; all we ask is that you be willing to listen to us. Come up to Concert Bureau and find out the facts before making "factual" claims.

'Five' Quits

To the Editor:

This is a letter addressed both to the students and to the Cynic staff, as it concerns my comic strip, "Five."

When I began drawing "Five" it was done as a joke to my friends and worked its way into some satires about UVM. But then I got very serious about the strip, so serious in fact, that I devote all my time to drawing, about 50 hours per strip, and that I am having all the strips, including 4 you haven't yet seen, printed as a book. Because of this venture, "Five" will no longer be in the Cynic. However, the book, The Adventures of Five in Tunneland, will be on sale in Billings during the last week of classes.

Last week, when I saw the huge headline of the title of my strip, and my name, atop someone elses comic, I quickly discovered what those two little holes are for in the sides of my sneakers. They're for drainage, when you take a good strong piss in your pants and it fills up your sneaks. But that was an error made by those very together printers who do the Cynic, not the Cynic staff.

However, my feelings concerning the paper is that the Cynic staff doesn't set high enough goals for their paper in dealing with quality of material, creativity in layout design, and, generally, making it a powerful, student-run newspaper. But then again, they have no choice in setting low goals because the quality and amount of input from the students is so low.

The Cynic is a very nonchalant type of affair every week, and it shows, because the paper definitely lacks color, and not visual color, power color.

The problem is the typical problem of UVM — the students don't display their creativity and color. There is a constant grey tone about this campus, and the Cynic is simply just another example. But what has always frustrated me was that here was this paper, with so much god damned potential of communication and growth within this little community, and it exists as an absolutely powerless thing. As a matter of fact, it's a rotten paper, and that's not directed toward the staff, it's toward the students, because with all the incredible creative potential and power existing, they keep it to themselves, unless they have something to complain about, then their creativity is boundless and magnificent.

Although the "Five" strip will no longer be in the Cynic, I am still in the process of drawing them, and if you have been following the story, check out the book from December 9 – 12 in Billings. With drawing 15 hours a day, I've already passed thru the 8 basic stages of visual hallucination. One thru six are simple black and white patterns, nothing elaborate. But seven and eight were the most beautiful spectrum colors swirling thru the stagecoach that was ripping across my desk, being pulled by a team of Irish Setters. You will easily pass through number nine when you read the end of the Adventures of Five.

With love,
Kenny Mirman

United Way Working

To the Editor:

This letter is to express our gratitude for the November 6 Cynic which featured the United Way Campaign on the front page. The professional job done on the graphics, and the pictures that showed the students volunteering in member agencies were magnificent. The feature section which dealt with case histories of United Way agencies and the personal expression of the student volunteers in several United Way organizations helped to tell the story of the 26 member agencies and their work in our community.

We are happy to report that $500 was raised from the UVM students which is a 100% increase over last year's total. We understand that the Fraternal Council has agreed to make the United Way an official charity. This support of the United Way and our community is very gratifying and we wish to thank all who participated in the project, especially Randy Lash, Publicity Director; the six area coordinators – Anne Swift, Pam Bryant, Jim Donlan, Cathy Lrash, Henry Lewis and Lee Leopold. Also thanks to Randy Jansen, Editor of the Cynic and Judy Holmes, Chairwoman of the campus United Way Drive.

You have demonstrated that "Love Does Wear Well" and thanks to you, it's working in Chittenden County!

Yours Truly,
George E. Little, Jr.

Thanks Everybody

To the Editor:

I, as a student of this University, think it is high time somebody spoke up for the services offered here on campus. I have heard people complaining about high prices in the Book Store, Den and Snack Bars once too often. It is time someone said a word or two on their behalf.

The services offer a rare commodity in our academic preparation for the real world. They instill the values of high prices, monopolistic competition and elite orientation into our capitalistic hearts and wallets. Without such guidance, we students would completely lose sight of reality.

While the Med students speed their brains out for their Ph.D's, and while the Ed students simulate their way to the unemployment line, and while everyone else pretends they're not doing the same – the services here on campus offer a refreshing screw.

Thanks Book Store! Thanks Den! Thanks Everybody, everywhere! Without you, I might still be convinced that students and their educations are worth a damn..and a little less money.

Sincerely,
David A. Pitonyak

Fisher Responds

To the Editor:

Due to the tremendous response to my letter which appeared in the Cynic, Nov. 6, 1975, I would like to answer the literally scores of comments I've received via U.S. Mail, Campus Mail, anonymous phone call, word of mouth and your Editorial page.

First, I readily admit that my attempt to parallel smoking with eating was not as successful as it might be, considering the dense and demanding audience I was writing for. But before you so eagerly condemn me to an illogical life in hell, let me remind you that for most people there is no choice between what kind of food they can eat. Just try and get out of your hoarding contract with Saga while living on campus. Just try and buy a ham product that doesn't contain mono-sodium glutumate. Just try and eat a cherry-flavored cereal that isn't artificially colored with that number two red dye, now said to be carcinogenic.

Second, I shouldn't have to defend that aspect of my article because it was only used as an illustration for my main point, which most everyone missed entirely. Contrary to popular comment, I never once argued the pros and cons of cigarette smoking and never argued that smoking wasn't bad for one's health! I have no need to learn what a dirty lung looks like, as Mr. Cronig seems to think either. My father was doing cancer research long before Cronig was even thought of. I probably saw more dirty lungs than he had toys in his crib.

If nothing else, all these high string emotional responses just reinforce my original opinion about mass media being an effective and yet very dangerous tool. For example, just because a NO SMOKING? caption was placed above my letter, you probably assumed it was an attack on non-smokers when in reality it was an attack on the media that so forcefully persuades its audience of its product. Whether it be to get you to buy this mouthwash or to vote for that candidate. I am personally appalled at how quickly our modern world will follow like lambs to the slaughter.

This time, the recent campaign for Non-Smokers Rights may be for a good cause. But what about next time? Will you follow just as blindly only to find it not-so-good after it is too late? Why is it that 3 years ago, before this campaign, it was virtually unheard of for one person to tell another to put their cigarette out? Why do people act upon something they may have always believed in, only after some broadcaster or poster tells them they can do it? How can we allow ourselves to be so docile? And why must I spell all this out to a college audience?

I am not inconsistant, illogical or sexually frustrated. I am not a murderer, the devil herself or an uneducated adult. I am a concerned human being who is thinking beyond the confines of an example like comparing Non-Smokers Rights and pink food. I am merely asking you to use your own logical reasoning powers on which to base your actions, instead of your emotions which are so easily preyed upon by Madison Avenue advertising firms.

Thank you,
A. C. Fischer

Concert Response

To the Editor:

This letter is a response to certain statements made after the weekend of New Riders, Chick Corea and the Rolling Thunder Revue.

First of all, it is true that Staige Davis is still co-chairman of the SA Concert Bureau as well as being SA President. This is due to Staige's personal desire to be involved in concerts at UVM and in no way detracts from his effectiveness as SA President. The rest of us on the concert bureau are happy to have him working with us and wish him to continue. Jim Fisher's letter to the editor of November 13th makes it appear as though Staige makes decisions on his own concerning concerts and policies at concerts. This is untrue; Staige and I discuss all matters together first regarding policy and usually the rest of the bureau is involved in decisions.

Secondly, concerning the New Riders, this concert was booked on the same night as Chick Corea because of the unavailability of coinciding dates of the gym and the New Riders. It was either have the New Riders on November 7th or not at all. We felt they would be a worthwhile act to bring to UVM. As it turned out, the concert bureau broke even on the New Riders' concert, contrary to David Ryan's false beliefs presented in his letter to the Cynic of November 13th.

Thirdly, the Bob Dylan concert, from what I can see, was a huge success for everyone involved. The main reason the concert took place in the gym was that the concert bureau gave the okay to put it there. The three thousand dollars that the concert bureau will receive from the Dylan concert is not to save face but to enhance our budget so that we will be able to give a free concert in the spring, something that hasn't happened at UVM for as long as I can remember. We now have more money in our budget than we started the year with. I, along with many others, worked very hard producing the Rolling Thunder Revue, and we received many compliments from all those involved.

Fourthly, in response to Jim Fisher's letter of November 13th, it is simply not true that the concert bureau and its work crew assumed all the seats in the front rows. At the Dylan concert, workers were forbidden to sit in the first two rows and many of the crew worked all through the concert on security. Staige and I have not sat down at a concert all year and work continuously through the concerts. Also, we do not have enough workers to fill the first six rows of seating, as Jim Fisher indicates. Workers are allowed to save one seat for themselves, which they sit in.

Finally, I am open to criticism, but I have nothing but contempt for people who write letters to editors without first finding out the facts as they are and not as what they believe them to be. In addition, it is unfair to blame Staige for things that are not solely his responsibility, and all future criticisms should be directed to the concert bureau as a whole.

Sincerely yours,
Alan J. Comad
Co-Chairman
SA Concert Bureau

Pregnancy Tests

To the Editor:

We wish to clarify some misleading information given by Dr. Turner in The Doctor's Bag in response to the question, "How soon following a missed period can you be sure you are pregnant?" Dr. Turner indicates it is wisest to wait until approximately four weeks after the first missed period to definitely confirm a diagnosis of pregnancy. If a woman is considering abortion as an alternative to an unplanned pregnancy, it is advisable to have a urine pregnancy test as soon as ten to fourteen (10-14) days after the first missed period, or approximately 38-42 days from the first day of the last menstrual period. The UCG slide test has occasional false positives and negatives, but a positive test is correct 99% of the time.

If a pregnancy is to be terminated, the earlier the detection, the safer and less complicated the termination. Waiting for four weeks, or for a second period to be missed may jeopardize the option of having an early safe abortion. Occasionally, woman have "false periods" when they are, in fact, pregnant; so if other symptoms of pregnancy exist, such as tender breasts, nausea, fatigue, abnormal period, and there is reason to suspect pregnancy, a urine pregnancy test is advisable.

Walk-in pregnancy tests are available at the Vermont Women's Health Center. Pregnancy tests are also available at the People's Free Clinic, The Lund Home, and the Medical Center Hospital of Vermont.

In health,

Remove Marks

To the Editor:

It's very distressing to see that a member of the University faculty would allow the actions of his students to deface the beauty of this campus and of the City of Burlington. That's exactly what happened when Professor Greg Blasdel sent his Art 3 students out to make their mark in society. Even though some students were opposed to this project he still subjected them to placing 12 marks identifying where they had been (sounds like Kilroy all over again) around campus and the City of Burlington. As I understand it there are 24 students in that class and some simple calculations yield the result of 288 symbols serving as a living memory to poor planning and bad judgment. I am sure, or, I hope, that Mr. Blasdel did not instruct his students to paint the Library, Billings Center, Cook, Votey, Living Learning, and just about anywhere you look, but he is responsible. Those wonderful green, black, red, orange and other marks must be removed so they can never be seen again, or even known that they were there. If it is necessary to use University funds to correct this situation, the Trustees should know why.

Don't forget your footsteps in the Queen City.

Successful Solution

To the Editor:

In response to Martin Alpern's article on the alleged contamination of the ice machines in Cook building by the Chemistry Department:

We at B-PAC feel that no matter what is in the ice dispensed by these machines, if the ice were used for what it was intended to be used for, there would be no reason to worry about it in the first place. We also have reason to believe that the possibility of a toxic contaminant being purposely dissolved in the ice is a remote one at best. However, we do invite anyone who wishes to find out for sure to serve some of the ice at their next cocktail party.

In concluding, we feel that the Chemistry Department should be congratulated, if not for their ethics, for an at-least-partially successful solution to a difficult problem. The only other solution would be the installation of locks on the doors of these machines, and anyone who has taken a chemistry lab can appreciate the inconvenience of such action.

Basic Skills Missing in Many College Students

(CPS) — When college students were the academic elite of their high school classes, college administrators and instructors assumed that entering freshmen knew basic grammar and composition cold. Now with more high school students going to college and admissions standards at many schools loosening, college administrators are recognizing the existence of a basic skills gap which handicaps many college students.

Colleges and universities across the country are setting up remedial programs to meet the needs of students who find they have never learned how to write in complete sentences. Basic skills programs are most prevalent at two-year and community colleges, but the problem has also surfaced at private four-year schools which have traditionally drawn the cream of the high school crop.

At the University of South Carolina (USC) where lower SAT scores prompted a remedial grammar class called English 100, the admissions director blamed the increasing popularity of college for decreasing proficiency in English skills. "A broader segment of people taking the test results in a broader base of ability being measured," he said, referring to the declining SAT scores.

The director of the English 100 program at USC called the program "a survival course" and accused high schools of over-emphasizing literature at the expense of grammar. "It isn't always the students' fault that they lack these skills," she said. "Most students tell us that the last time they had a grammar review was the eighth grade."

Other university officials have different explanations for the under-educated college student. Jerome Weber, University College Dean at Oklahoma University, attributed part of the problem to the shifts in high school goals from the three R's to more social and personal growth.

Others claimed it was a problem unique to this generation which was raised on television and radio. Instructors at the University of California have reported that students in their freshman English classes are not proficient in even the fundamentals of grammar. The remedial English or Subject A supervisor argued that this "illiteracy" was a "cultural problem, as students in an electronic society have little chance to acquire reading-writing skills."

According to the director of academic programs at UCLA, the television society is to blame for less educated college students. "Students today are more verbal," he said. "They don't read. They don't have the written skills they once did. They're TV educated."

But a recent report in the Christian Science Monitor holds the whole college-oriented society responsible for the lower level of skills of incoming freshmen. The report states that many officials feel the reason for the student skills gap is the fact that the whole post-secondary education system has become much less elite.

This has been particularly true in recent years when many colleges have begun admitting students who would not have met the minimum qualifications for admission several years ago when the competition for college space was fiercer. For instance, students with SAT verbal scores of 350 can be admitted to the University of South Carolina, but enrollment in a basic skills program is required for freshmen with verbal scores between 350 and 390.

Although hundreds of colleges and universities are making basic skills programs available to their students, it is often the student's choice to attend or not to attend. Unfortunately, many students do not recognize their own needs for remedial classes and spurn them. There is still a stigma attached to classes which set out to do no more than teach college students skills they should have acquired in secondary schools. And many colleges which offer basic skills classes give little or no college credit for the hours spent catching up.

But if the basic skills levels of incoming freshmen continues to decline, students may rush to the remedial English courses just to insure their survival in regular college classrooms.

VPIRG Column

There are over two million hospital employees in the country, eighty-five percent of whom are women. Few of these women, however, are in positions of authority in the health care industry. According to the Women's Work Projects, Women in Health, women in 1973 made up only 12% of the pharmacists, 9.3% of the physicians and 3.5% of the nation's dentists. Even though most of the health care employees are female, only 9.1% of the hospital administrators are women.

In 1970 the median annual income for doctors was close to $40,000 with many specialists making several hundred thousand dollars. Doctors surely run a highly successful "small" business.

Nurses and other hospital paraprofessionals, on the other hand, are often grossly underpaid. Traditionally hospitals have paid their workers far less than workers in other industries. According to the Vermont State Nurses' Association, the Medical Center Hospital in Burlington, the state's largest and most sophisticated hospital is understaffed, it overworks the nurses and the house staff, is unresponsive to the employees and as a result, shortchanges the patients.

One reason that hospital officials can pay their employees so little is the fact that few hospital workers are unionized. In 1970, only 15% of the 2.6 million hospital workers were in a union. No hospital in Vermont is unionized.

Recently a group of employees from the Rutland Hospital have tried to start a union at the hospital in that city. Reluctant hospital officials, reacting to the union move, issued a press release saying: "Unions cannot in any meaningful way improve our hospital and should be opposed." The prepared statement said that the hospital would continue to bar organizers from its premises. The usual argument given by hospital officials is that they are only trying to insure good health care for the people in the community. Prohibiting unions deprives large numbers of workers of their right to collective bargaining.

Another reason why hospitals can pay the women so poorly is the fact of rigid stratification of employee's duties. Although many Registered Nurses (RN) are paid little, they are encouraged by the fact that they are more important than the other paraprofesionals such as the orderlies who are paid the least of all.

One positive sign for the future is the fact that the percentage of women entering medical school has increased from 5.7% in 1960 to 15.4% in the 1973-74 school year. This figure however is far from being 50% but it is at least a positive change. Hopefully, women will not only make up a large portion of the nurses, lab technicians and other paraprofessionals but will also have a more formidable voice as administrators, doctors and dentists.

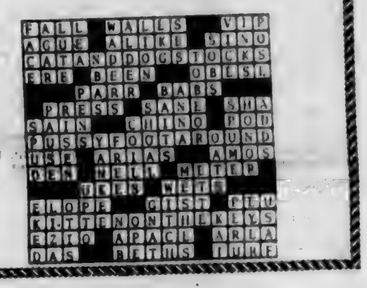
LAST WEEK'S ANSWER



Looking For Louise On A Cold Windy Day Part VII

by Gregory Katz

As we headed north, we entered the dairy country. Vermont flattened out and stretched towards the Canadian Plains. The Plymouth shook and groaned in pain. Wind whooshed in through the floorboards. Poot played with the radio, but I couldn't hear it over the muffler.

At the border the blue-eyed Canadian Customs man was not very impressed with our vehicle. He didn't really want to let us in. I offered to leave him Jeddyboy as collateral, but he just gave me a dirty look. Finally, after conferring with a machine in Washington, we were admitted into Canada.

They didn't hear the muffler till we pulled away, accelerating into the night.

We stopped in St. Jean so Reed could buy some cognac. Reed opened his bottle and started passing it around. Why did Reed blow six bucks on fancy cognac when all I wanted was a flask of Pleasant Moments Whiskey? Anyway, cognac was all we had, so I sipped at it as it went by. In the next town Poot stopped for a six of Molson's. That was more my style. I gulped it it happily, letting it fill me up. Poot was driving fast, talking about his new job. He was teaching astronomy, auto mechanics, and basketball at a free school in Hinesburg. Eddy wanted a job there as resident piano man. Reed told Poot he was bourgeois, that all he wanted was to settle down, get a weekly check, and screw sixteen year old girls.

"That sounds good to me," I said.

"Yeah, you'd be happy there, Greg. You could be creative writing teacher and be very sensitive. You wouldn't have to write," Reed came back at me.

"I like sixteen year old girls. They're enthusiastic."

"That's cause you still think you're in high school. If you opened your eyes you would realize you're just another pizzaman'rowdy who can't keep his head on straight."

"Yeah, Reed. But I've heard you talk about Plato, and I've heard you talk about Lao-Tzu, and I've heard you chant and meditate and seen you take peyote in the desert. But I never see you relax or take off that dumb tie."

"I like my tie."

"Shut up you guys, I wanta finish talking about my school," Poot came in.

"It's raining, Poot. Turn on your wipers," said Eddy.

"Ain't got none. The wires are on the floor if you want to connect them."

"But you gotta do more than screw the students and play basketball," said Reed.

"Why?" Poot asked, turning around to face Reed in the back seat.

"Yeah, why?" echoed Jeddyboy, who had been sitting next to Reed reading a comic book.

Reed didn't know, so he laughed and swigged at the cognac. Maybe he never relaxed, but he could sure drink that stuff.

The rain came down pretty hard for a while. We were on a two-way road and Poot was having trouble seeing. I dropped down under the dashboard, balancing my second beer on the floor, and fiddled with the wires. There were a lot of loose wires tangled up. I touched two together.

"The lights, Greg, dammit. I can't see." Poot yelled.

I guess I had shorted something. I pulled the wires apart. The headlights came back on. Then I tried touching three wires together. Nothing happened. Then I ripped two wires apart, and the radio stopped working. Meanwhile Poot was swerving around nearly blinded by the rain. Then I saw a wire hidden behind the steering column. I touched it to the wiper switch. Bingo!

I sat back in my seat very impressed with myself. I hadn't even kicked over the beer. Poot could see again, and he floored the Plymouth. We were getting near the city, and I could see the lights up ahead. We pulled off for more beer, buying Labatt this time. Jeddy spoke French to the storekeeper, and asked him if he believed in Lake Champlain.

Finally we pulled off the Champlain Bridge into downtown Montreal. All of a sudden there were a million cars around us honking and squonking. Poot was drunk, and the Plymouth drove like a tank and sputtered like mad. Big buildings, all grey and brown, ganged up on us. Where was Archie Shepp? Who would take us to heaven? Who could even park the car?

Ahhh, those cars sounded good. Neon explosions came off the big marquees. What good was Vermont anyway? Poot fought the traffic and headed over to the Old Quarter. We parked near a bakery shop and walked over to "In Concert." It was 5 minutes to nine. The place was set on the corner of two cobbled roads, and there was a big sign that said "ARCHIE SHEPP TONIGHT." We walked in and paid the guy $3.50.

It took my eyes a few minutes to adjust to the light, but then the place came through to me. It looked like a distinguished old restaurant, with great chandeliers hanging from the roof. There was a series of marble tables with comfortable leather chairs. The stage was raised a half a foot from the front tables. In a semicircle around the last of the tables was a huge bench with armrests for drinks. The whole place was clean and shining, and in the darkness took on a sort of glow. We took a table near the rear, Reed slipping in and taking off his overcoat. I saw the flask of Hennessey's bulging in his pocket.

By the time we all sat down the waiter came by. We all ordered beers. There was even sort of a maitre d' who came over to see if everything was cool. I asked him if we could sit through all the shows, and he said "of course."

"Eddy, this is it. The fast train to heaven."

"Yeah, man. If this was New York, it would smell like pigs, they'd charge us $5.50 at the door, and kick us out after one set. When Gato plays here we should rent a room somewhere and come here every night!"

Reed had drained his beer and poured some cognac in the mug. We passed it around. Then the lights went out, and a voice said "Ladies and Gentlemen, 'In Concert' is proud to present to you – Archie Shepp."

The lights came on, but Archie wasn't there. His band was doing an intro, and they sounded fine. The drummer was older than my father, but his eyes glared out through the smoke. There was a bass and a piano, but the man at center stage was like nothing I had ever seen. You take your jazzman, he's cool, he's dressed fine and knows what he wants to play, he comes out and does it, he gives it to you, but it's refined somehow. Not this guy. He stood on center stage, wailing into his trombone, a middle-aged black man with a huge gut, his hair thinning, his jaw jutting out. He stood there in just some blue jeans and a clean white tee-shirt, his belly all exposed, his face sweating, playing it. He moved up and down with the song. Right away I figured he had it.

Then Archie came on, dressed in a three-piece suit and a fancy hat. He wailed slow on his sax, letting it lilt and play off the trombone. The trombone man smiled, he was so strange, he reminded me of Sergeant Bilko on TV, so comic somehow, but man that trombone was a living breathing thing, I swear it. And you could see he was running the set, that he arranged it so Archie could improvise and have the band in the right place at the right time.

Archie took off into solo. He took my mind with him. Up far sounding. Down, harder, over again, he stretched the solo out, slowed it in the middle, it slowed down, and then, picking up the melody, he came back, just a little faster... faster... faster, and the drummer came in – CRASH – and they were off again. was moving with them. And Bilko stood on the side, watching, smiling. They wound up their first number, and Jeddy groaned when they finished it. He jumped up all of a sudden, then he sat down and sipped his beer. I was sweating.

The next song was a ballad. Bilko took it way down, then Archie came in and played one soft line over and over again, letting it build. Over and over. Finally, it came all the way out. I let my head roll with the song. They were taking me new places.

The whole set was like that. They controlled the tempo and I just flosted in what came out. I would look at Poot and wink every once in a while, but that was all.

When the set ended, my eyes snapped to attention. "Beer!" thought, and motioned to Poot, "Beer."

The guy running the place said we could leave and come back, so Poot and I went out on the streets, looking for a bar. There was sort of a strange cafeteria around the block, with a little sign that said "Biere 25 cents." We walked in and sat at a square table.

A waiter came over. "Much beer, please." He didn't speak English so I tried again, "Plus des bieres, s'il vous plait." He went off and came back with the drafts. Poot was laughing.

"So Poot, my boy, we seem to be in heaven."

"Yeup."

The beer tasted fine, but it seemed to bring me down a little. My head was still buzzing from the music, but other thoughts all came back. And Ingrid floated up into my mind.

"It's real nice to be here, away from all the shit I've been dealing with," I said.

"Yeup. Jeddy tole me you've been feeling down. What's been going wrong?"

"Well, I got busted last night for driving a stolen motorboat."

"What?"

"You heard me."

"K-Boy, what did you do that for? What's going on? Are you becoming an outlaw again? I thought we left that out in New Mexico?"

"Well, it was cause of work, which was cause of Ingrid, on account of I ain't living with her no more, so I got a jcb, and I got mad. I feel good now, but my mind is working too hard on it all."

"You're drunk too." Poot was very observant.

"Yup."

"But what happened with Ingrid? Why did it bring you down? You were so happy with her the last time I saw you. I thought you were finally loose with someone that you liked. It seemed so good."

"I don't know what happened. She got sick and it turned sour."

"Why?"

"Well, I got mad when she was seeing this other guy. Then when she was sick, I started worrying about her, her health and like that. I don't think she liked me worrying about her."

"Why were you mad about the other guy?"

"Poot, you know me. You know I can't handle stuff like that. I go to pieces inside."

"But you told me you wanted to keep things light with her."

"I wanted to, but I didn't let it happen like that."

"So you must have freaked her out, like she felt how much you worried about her and thought about her, and she didn't want you like that."

"Great, Poot, you figured it out. Thanks, but so what? So I write myself off as a maniac?"

"Greg, Greg. Calm down. I was just wondering how it happened."

"OK, I'm sorry. But you guys are always telling me how weird I act, like it's a great joke, or some destiny, but it hurts, too. I feel like I took someone who really cared about me and made her just want to run."

"It's not a one-way thing like that, Greg. You know that."

"I've just been a robot in Burlington, making pizzas, sleeping, and feeling hurt. Now I want to let go. Being here feels so good, riding with Archie, letting it carry me. Then my mind brings me back, and I miss her, and I'm pissed at Vermont."

"I know how you feel, Greg. You had your solitude, and you gave it away. Now you're alone and don't feel so good. But let it go, you're letting things get to you, taking it too seriously."

"I know, Poot. You're right. But when my mind goes back, then I'm there in the summer, drinking in her tan and her thighs."

"You're drunk, Greg."

Just then Reed and Jeddy burst in the door. Reed ran up behind me and grabbed me by the neck. He started to pull in his arms and strangle me.

"We're taking you away, Katz. You're a public menace, and I won't stand for it." Reed said in a solemn voice, pulling me harder and harder.

I went limp in his arms. Jeddy made him let go, and I fell back in my chair.

"Hi, Reed," said Poot. "Are they playing yet?"

Interview WithWith Roger Mcguinn:
'Dylan's a punk but I really like the guy.'

by Ron Tepper

After trying to track down Bob Dylan, in vain, for an interview, I decided to set my sights a little lower and interview probably the most underrated Rock star of the last two decades: Roger McGuinn. McGuinn, now 33, was the founder and leader of the Byrds for their entire eight years of existence. Along with writing such hits as "Chestnut Mare" and "Eight Miles High," McGuinn is also known to play the 12 string guitar as well as anyone in the business. After hours of trying to track him down, we finally got a hold of him as he was leaving his car, and gladly granted us this 20 minute interview. Also involved in this event were my friends, Jerry Nolting, Eric Thum, and a sweet hitchhiker named Donna Kaplin. This is that interview.

Cynic: How did you get involved with the "Rolling Thunder Revue"?

McGuinn: I had a few days off in New York City and I bumped into Bob Dylan, and he was really glad to see me and he told me that I should come along with him on this trip, and I did.

Cynic: Are you planning on doing anything solo in the show?

McGuinn: Yea, I do "Chestnut Mare."

Cynic: When was the first time you ever met Bob Dylan?

McGuinn: It was back in 1961 in Greenwich Village at Gerde's Folk City. He and I were both folk singers in hootenannies at the time.

Cynic: Did you originally turn him on to electric music?

McGuinn: No, not really. It's just what was happening at the time. The Beatles proved that you could do good quality music and it didn't have to be trash, using electric instruments. I might have been some influence on him, but I was only part of it. I certainly wouldn't take credit for it.

Cynic: How did the Byrds originally get together?

McGuinn: Well, it started in Los Angeles at a club called the Troubadour. I was working alone at the time doing folk songs with a rock and roll beat to it. The audience hated it, but I was spotted by Gene Clark, and he really got into it, so we formed a duo. That was really a flop, and I realized that we needed another voice in the act, and at that point, David Crosby walked in the door. I had known David from before, and I knew he could sing. We were going to approach him, but we really didn't even have to. He came up to us and pleaded to let him play with us. David happened to have connections with Royal Pacific records, so we used to go into the studio there and practice for hours on 4 track machines. We had unlimited tape, and it was really nice. We practiced for about eight months like that. During the process of all this, we picked up Chris Hillman, who at the time, was a mandolin player in one of the local bluegrass bands. Then we picked up Mike Clarke, who was a congo player in San Francisco, and he looked right for the part, kind of a cross between Mick Jagger and Brian Jones. It was all kind of magical!

Cynic: So you paid your dues.

McGuinn: Oh yea, I still am.

Cynic: Do you feel that the group kind of dragged on a little too long?

McGuinn: Yea, if I have any regrets about it, it was going through all those personal changes. I should have faded out a little bit sooner, but I was caught in a financial bind at the time. I had all these agents pressuring me into keeping it up, but eventually I had to give it up because the feeling was gone and I didn't enjoy it anymore. Now, I'm on my own. I'm Roger McGuinn of the Byrds no longer. I'm very proud to have been involved in that legend, but it's gone.

Cynic: Roger, did you ever have any musical training?

McGuinn: Yes, I went to the Old Town music school in Chicago. I was one of the first people to enroll in it, and the first to leave it. My instructor wanted me to take some extra lessons from him at $10 a shot, and I couldn't afford it, so I left.

Cynic: Do you play any other instruments besides guitar?

McGuinn: Yes, I play banjo, bass, and a little mandolin. I never did play piano. I could, but I just wasn't into it, then or now.

Cynic: Did you play any bluegrass?

McGuinn: I sure did. I used to play out at Washington Square with guys like Eric Weisberg and Marshall Brigman. We used to have a lot of fun picking banjo and singing till all hours of the morning.

Cynic: You know Barry McGuire pretty well. Is he still recording?

McGuinn: I really don't know. The last that I heard, he was out somewhere in Australia being a Jesus Freak. I don't know, I haven't seen him in years, but he's a really nice guy.

Cynic: What's the whole feeling behind the revue here? Is it trying to recapture...

McGuinn: It's magical, and just forget about it, it's great. It's not trying to do anything, it's doing something. It's just hanging out, it's like Greenwich Village, just on the road.

Cynic: Where would you like to be with your music right now?

McGuinn: There's nowhere else I'd rather be with my music, or anything else. This music I'm playing now, it's just dynamite. I've never felt better in my life about anything.

Cynic: Do you think that this tour might influence other artists into doing the same?

McGuinn: Maybe, but I doubt it. It's not economically practical. I mean you have to be rich to do it. I mean Bob is not making any money on this tour. He's doing it for love. Thus, the smaller audiences, etc. In fact, we pretty much all feel the same.

Cynic: Is Bob Dylan as moody and private as he seems to the public?

McGuinn: Well... it's sort of like knowing Picasso. Actually, he's just another guy. He's a punk, as a matter of fact, but I like him.

Cynic: Is there any kind of unified feeling that you all had when putting this show together?

McGuinn: No, it materialized on a less calculated level than that.

Cynic: What do you think of Vermont?

McGuinn: Here it is. It's great. I love maple syrup. Actually, I've been here a number of times. It's good country. Isn't the weather amazing today! It's November in Vermont, and I'm walking around in a tee shirt. It's great.

Cynic: Did the deaths of Gram Parsons and Clarence White have a strong emotional impact on you?

McGuinn: Are you kidding? It tore me up. Especially Clarence. Gram, well... he was my friend. But Clarence, he was my buddy. He's the closest friend I've ever had. I think about him all the time. I st do.

Cynic: How did he die?

McGuinn: He was hit by a car, some drunk women, and went hurling around 70 feet into a telephone pole.

Cynic: What is the story behind "Hurricane Carter"?

McGuinn: Well, Dylan wants to get him out of jail because he was framed. He was accused of killing three white people at a bar in New Jersey and he didn't do it. In fact, the witnesses who said he did do it went back to the judge recently and told him that they lied. They're going to give him a retrial. I just heard that on the news yesterday. Bob wrote a song about it.

Cynic: Do you see the "Rolling Thunder Revue" as being a form of social protest?

McGuinn: No, I don't. Basically, it's just good music without any socially redeeming value. That's with the exception of "Hurricane," and I think it has done some good!

Cynic: What was your personal feeling about the original Byrds getting back together to do that album a few years ago?

McGuinn: I didn't like it. Actually, it was all David Crosby's fault. He was on a real ego trip that just made it impossible to work with. The album itself was too disjointed and difficult from the financial aspect. David really did the album to prove that he was the real genius behind the Byrds, and he proved that he wasn't. Actually, despite our faults, we are still pretty good friends. In fact, we were thinking of making another album in order to save face.

Cynic: How long did the Byrds really last?

McGuinn: Well, the original Byrds lasted only about 2 years. The Clarence White, Skip Battin, and Gene Parsons group lasted much longer, and was probably a better band besides.

Cynic: And then you worked with John Guerin also.

McGuinn: Yea, John Guerin came in when Gene Parsons got uptight about his paychecks being withheld. I had to let him go, but we are still friends now, you know, it's cool.

Cynic: Getting back to tonight for a moment, do you think that they'll be making an album from this tour?

McGuinn: I'm not sure. They might. I know they're making a film.

Cynic: Do you enjoy touring in small cities like Burlington?

McGuinn: Yea, it's kind of a relief from those larger places. Actually, with the exception of recently touring with the Eagles to crowds of 15,000 or so, I really haven't been touring in the really large cities in years. Small towns are really nice though. They're friendly and more intimate.

Cynic: Looking back on your history, I get the feeling that you've really been screwed. I mean, you were the Byrds and yet...

McGuinn: Don't let it bother you man. Really! I mean it doesn't bother me, and there is certainly no reason it should bother you.

Cynic: One last question. Out of all the songs you've ever written, which ones are your favorite?

McGuinn: "Chestnut Mare" would have to be my favorite.

At this point, we closed the interview. Just as I was about to get up, Eric asked McGuinn for a picture, and responded by expanding his chest so that his tee shirt was fully exposed. It read, "Free Hurricane Carter," so it seemed as though the interview would end on a serious note, but not with McGuinn. As Eric took the shot with a 35 mm, McGuinn shouted "SHIT" instead of "CHEESE" and cracked us all up.

Roger McGuinn with interviewer Ron Tepper.

Romantic Pride And Prejudice

Burlington audiences will be in for quality entertainment this weekend with the opening of Jane Austen's classic, Pride and Prejudice. The play, adapted for the stage by Nancy Haynes, Assistant Professor of Communication at the University of Vermont, concerns the romantic adventures of the Bennet family's lively daughters. Pride and Prejudice affords a witty and often humorous illustration of early 19th century moral standards and romantic relationships.

The main action is a running battle of wits between Elizabeth Bennet (Nadine Maleski) and Mr. Darcy (Peter Kurth). The romance of these reluctant lovers is complemented by the relationships between Elizabeth's parents (the flighty Mrs. Bennet played by Susan Selig and the dry-humored Mr. Bennet by Vincent Rossano) and between her sisters (Jane played by Karen Trott and Lydia by Sara O'Neil) and their respective suitors (Mr. Bingley played by Dan Page and Captain Wickham by David S. Gedkin). Yet another romantic duo is formed by the obsequious Reverend Mr. Collins (Paul Ugalde) and the sensible Charlotte Lucas (Brooke Gladstone).

December 16, 1975 marks the bicentennial of Jane Austen's birth in Steventon, Hampshire, England. It is fitting that a new adaptation of her most beloved work should be produced at this time. Live musical accompaniment from the works of Chopin, and William Schenk's scenic design add an authentic and stimulating setting to the production. A display of the costume designs and momentos of the Jane Austen bicenterary celebration now taking place in England is in the lower lobby of the Royall Tyler Theatre along with some beautiful volumes of Austen's works.

Tickets are now on sale for Pride and Prejudice at the Royall Tyler Theatre box office. Reservations may be made by calling 656-2094. The production opens November 19 and runs through Saturday, November 22.

Pride and Prejudice's heroine, Nadine Maleski.

Limelight Chaplin's Last US Film

Limelight, Charlie Chaplin's last American film (1952), will be shown on Friday, November 21, at both 7:30 p.m. and 9:30 p.m., in Marsh Life Sciences Building Auditorium.

This is the concluding film in the Charlie Chaplin Classic Film series presented this fall by the Lane Film Society Series.

Limelight is a story of age giving over to youth. Chaplin plays Calvero, an aging Music Hall star, who befriends a young dancer (Claire Bloom), who has tried to commit suicide. It is a nostalgic film, a loving look at the world of Chaplin's own youth. There are marvelous recreations of Music Hall routines, including one in which Buster Keaton performs with Chaplin.

Another sequence in the film is a ballet, with Andre Eglersky as Harlequin, Melissa Hayden as Columbine, and Charles Chaplin, Charles Chaplin Jr., and Wheeler Dryden as clowns.

The picture was released just as anti-Chaplin feeling was at its height in the US, and the film received very few American bookings. When Chaplin left the country for the European premiere of Limelight, the government revoked his re-entry permit--Chaplin had remained an English citizen all the years he was in the US. The film was withdrawn, and was not seen again in the United States until 1972.

Limelight did not play in the Los Angeles area at its 1952 release, and therefore did not qualify for Academy Award consideration that year. When the film was reissued, it made its first appearance in LA, and Chaplin was nominated for and won the Academy Award for best original musical score.

Tickets for Limelight, $1.00 each, are available in the Lane Office, 234 Waterman, and at the door on movie night. For reservations, tel. 656-3418.

Visit the Land of the Snow with ,The Nutcracker

The classic holiday ballet The Nutcracker, performed by the Hartford Ballet Co., appears for the third consecutive year in the Lane Series on Saturday, December 6, at 8 p.m. in Memorial Auditorium.

Accompanying the ballet will be the Vermont Symphony Ballet Orchestra, conducted by Efrain Guigui.

The Hartford Ballet production will present the full-length Nutcracker complete with costumes and sets, including the Christmas tree, a replica of the one used by the N.Y. City Ballet in its performances at Lincoln Center.

The ballet sold out to capacity audiences when it appeared under Lane auspices in 1973 and 1974.

Set to the familiar music of Tchaikovsky, The Nutcracker is the story of a Christmas Eve party at the home of the Von Stahlbaums in nineteenth century Germany. The magical Dr. Drosselmyer, godfather to Clara and Fritz Von Stahlbaum, comes to the party with a painted nutcracker as a gift for Clara. When the guests have left, Clara creeps downstairs and falls asleep with the nutcracker in her arms. She dreams about toy soldiers who grow to life-size and battle with equally life-size mice. Finally, the wicked Mouse King is slain, and the nutcracker is transformed into a handsome Prince.

When Clara awakes, she finds herself in a world of white slopes and snowflakes, the Land of the Snow. Then Clara and her Nutcracker Prince sail to another kingdom, where a Sugar Plum Fairy tempts Clara all the Sweets of a little girl's dreams. The final temptation is the dance of the Sugar Plum Fairy and the Nutcracker Prince. All too soon, Christmas Eve is over, and the Nutcracker Prince takes Clara home in his magical sleigh.

Judith Gosnell and Roland Roux as the Sugar Plum Fairy and Nutcracker Prince

Balletic highlights of the Nutcracker include such divertissements as the Spanish, Arabian, Chinese and Trepak dances and the Waltz of the Flowers. These are followed by the famous Grand Pas de Deux, danced by the Sugar Plum Fairy and the Nutcracker Prince, and the great Finale by the entire company.

The Hartford Ballet is one of the nation's leading ballet companies. Under the artistic direction of Michael Uthoff since July, 1972, the young, professional company has evolved from a school of ballet that was founded in 1960. The purpose of the troupe is to present the finest dance choreographed by new as well as established choreographers in both the classic ballet and modern dance techniques.

Dancers in the 20 member company have been drawn from major troupes throughout the world and from the School of the Hartford Ballet. During the 1975-76 season, the company has been engaged for the most extensive tour of any ballet company in the nation, one that will take the Hartford dancers from North Dakota to Arkansas and from Vermont to California and Alaska in more than 50 performances. Future seasons will see the Hartford Ballet on tour throughout the United States, Europe, Southeast Asia, and South America.

Michael Uthoff became artistic director of the Hartford Ballet in the summer of 1972. A native of Chile, where his parents were the founding directors of the Chilean National Ballet, Mr. Uthoff has choreographed over 10 ballets in the neo-classic, romantic and contemporary styles which have become the foundation and trade-mark of the Hartford Ballet's repertoire. Additionally, he has created works for the Juilliard Dance Ensemble, the Minnesota Dance Theatre, the City Center Joffrey Ballet, Ballet Clasico 70 of Mexico, the First Chamber Dance Company of New York, the Caramoor Music Festival, the Honolulu Opera Theatre, and for Melissa Hayden and Peter Martins of the New York City Ballet.

Mr. Uthoff came to the United States in 1962 under a Rockefeller Foundation Scholarship to study dance at the Juilliard School, the Martha Graham School of Contemporary Dance, and the School of American Ballet. As a principal dancer with the Jose Limon Dance Company and the City Center Joffrey Ballet, he worked with such international dance figures as Antony Tudor, Gerald Arpino, Lotte Goslar, Jerome Robbins, Anna Sokolow, Jose Limon, and Norman Walker.

Tickets for the Nutcracker, $5, $4 and $3, are on sale in the Lane Office, 234 Waterman. For reservations, tel. 656-3418.

Vermont Crafts '75

The Robert Hull Fleming Museum, UVM is pleased to announce its annual holiday exhibition, Vermont Crafts '75. Opening November 24 and remaining on view through January 4, this is an invitational show of outstanding work by Vermont craftspeople.

The emphasis of the exhibition is to create an environment for living; furniture, ceramics, wall hangings, toys, tools, and cloth items will be displayed in a liveable setting. Among the featured work will be a dining room set by Simon Watts of Putney, wall hangings by Elsa Waller and Meg Walker, pottery by George and Terry Scatchard of Cambridge, and jewelry by Laurie Spivak, Helen Beckerhoff and Tim Grannis. One section of the exhibition will be devoted to toys: stuffed, knitted, and wooden. The variety of works and materials should provide interesting ideas for every aspect of the home environment from ceiling to floor.

A Holiday Craft Shop will be in the Lounge Gallery of the Museum in conjunction with the main exhibition. The shop is in direct response to the requests of visitors to past craft exhibitions at the Museum. While the works in the exhibition-proper are one-of-a-kinds, and the finest work that a particular craftsman has produced, many visitors, as a result of their gallery visit, desire to purchase smaller craft items for their own use. Included in the craftshop will be candles, stained glass, pottery, toys, weaving, knitting, wood-crafts, cards, patchwork kits, planters, and innumerable other specialty items, all also by Vermont craftspeople.

Charlotte Potok displays her porcelain.

The Holiday Craft Shop will be open from November 24 through the morning of December 24. Craftshop hours are Mondays-Fridays 9–5, and Wednesday evenings from 7 to 10:30. The Museum is closed on Saturdays, and will also be closed the evening of November 26, as well as all day November 27 and 28. The Fleming Museum is located on Colchester Avenue, just west of Mary Fletcher Hospital.

Dionne Warwicke in Performance on ETV

The last Lane concerts of the fall semester will be two performances of the six Bartok quartets (three at each performance) by the Concord String Quartet on Dec 8 and Dec 10.

In Performance at Wolf Trap will present Dionne Warwicke in concert Monday, Dec. 1, at 8:00 on Vermont ETV.

The 60-minute color special will feature Miss Warwicke and a full orchestra performing 18 songs – from "I Say A Little Prayer," one of her earliest hits, to her current single, "Burn Our Bridges."

Like all specials in the In Performance series, which is made possible by a grant from Atlantic Richfield Company, the Dionne Warwicke concert was taped as it was presented at Wolf Trap Farm Park for the Performing Arts.

WETA, Washington, D.C.'s public television center, produced the series for national distribution by the Public Broadcasting Service.

The special will feature many of Miss Warwicke's best-known songs including "Alfie," "I'll Never Fall in Love Again," and "Do You Know the Way to San Jose?"

In addition, Miss Warwicke will perform a collection of songs other performers have made famous: Stevie Wonder's "All in Love Is Fair," Roberta Flack's "I Feel Like Making Love," Olivia Newton-John's "I Honestly Love You," and many others.

In Performance hosts, opera star Beverly Sills and public television correspondent David Prowitt, will introduce the telecast.

"It was an electric night at Wolf Trap," Prowitt said. "Dionne demonstrated why she's one of today's biggest music stars."

Prowitt, who is also executive producer of the series, added, "When the concert was over the audience gave her a ten-minute standing ovation."

Clark Santee directed the special. Ruth Leon is producer of In Performance at Wolf Trap. Jim Karayn is executive-in-charge of the project.

Burlington Dance Theater's Jazz Workshop

The Burlington Dance Theatre, Inc., will present a Jazz Workshop with Robin Powell at the Southwick Ballroom, UVM, on Saturday, November 22, and Sunday, November 23.

Class scheduling is the same for both Saturday and Sunday. From 10:30 a.m. to 12 noon will be the Novice Class. This is especially for students ages 10-13. Previous experience is not necessary, but any dance preparation would be helpful. The Beginner/Intermediate Class will go from 1 p.m. to 2:30 p.m. This class is for those with little or no dance experience. From 3 p.m. to 4:30 p.m. will be the Intermediate/Advanced Class, a faster paced class for those with previous dance background (Ballet, Modern or Jazz).

Local Musical Talent

by Kathleen Browne

The Pine Island String Band and The John Cassel Band, both local groups, were featured this weekend at the Mill in Winooski and at the Sting. On Friday night the Mill was jam-packed full of people, drinking 50 cent beers, standing, talking or sitting comfortably near the fireplace. Arriving at about 9:30 the place was already crowded with people who enjoy listening to live music and boogie. The crowd was sedate only during the band's break. Once the band started playing, the foot stompin' started. Although space was limited, people danced in large groups, with partners or individually. The banjo player, Vermont's state champ, was excellent as well as their fiddler. The atmosphere was one of celebration and gaiety. People forgot their inhibitions and worries and got into the swing of the party.

On Saturday night the John Cassel Band, another fine local band, was featured at the Sting. Playing a wide variety of music including jazz, rock, blues, and country, it was evident the band was enjoying themselves as much as the crowd. The brass section included Tommy Steele on Sax, a trumpet player, along with guitarist and drummer and of course John Cassel on piano and organ. The band played some of their own tunes including the popular Blowing Away In The Country along with the Beatle's Rocky Racoon, B.B. King's The Thrill Is Gone, and Stevie Wonder's You Are The Sunshine Of My Life and songs by Sonny Rollins. My only regret was that the four women scat singers did not appear with the band as they have in the past. At the close of their show the band announced an upcoming concert in December in which they will be playing with The Brian Curry Band, Road Apple and Poco.

This weekend was a fine weekend for listening and boogying to two fine local bands of Burlington. So if you want to hear some good live music or boogie, keep your eyes and ears open for local groups such as the John Cassel Band and The Pine Island String Band, and have a great time.

The Way --Music With A Message

by Scott Curtis

Last Wednesday night at the Flynn, four hundred people witnessed a unique concert, featuring "The Way," a Christian rock band from Southern California. Bill Yantz, of Vergennes, who opened the night with an acoustic set, told the audience that he was performing not only to entertain the audience, but to introduce people to his friend, Jesus Christ. This proved to be the theme of the entire evening, as Jesus Christ was portrayed through fine folk and rock music.

"The Way" opened their first set with a rocker entitled, "Livin' on the Bottle." The song reflected some of the band's pre-Christian life. It presented the solution and the consequences of the life of drug and alcohol dependency. This song also revealed the band's talent. Alex MacDougall, on percussion, led the band in its exact, tight rhythm. The bearded John Wickem played an outstanding, yet unpretentious lead guitar.

The group followed with "The Days of Noah," portraying the rainy night, and the general state of immorality and violence in mankind today. "The Way" slowed the tempo as the set progressed as they sang some softer songs and some country rock. After one country flavored song, bassist Gary Arthur quipped, "God loves country music!" Later he explained that God loved all music that is sung to glorify Him.

The main emphasis of "The Way" was to testify to their lives being changed by God. "Ain't Nobody Gonna Take My Joy Away," a fast light song, testified to their joy in Christ. "He Can Change Your Life," a Stephen Stills–Manassus style song, gave a direct message to the audience. Both "The Way" and Bill Yantz stressed that they did not wish to push Jesus upon people. They wished only to present Him and His work fully.

Bill Yantz' opening set was good in itself, and also a fine warm-up for "The Way." With his folk-tenor voice, he sang originals, songs by leading Christian writers, Paul Clark and Ted Sandquist, and Bob Dylan's "If Not For You," addressed to Jesus.

The evening ended with a Biblical message from Dale Yancey (Brother Dale), of the Community Bible Church. He stressed God's giving nature, how God had given His Son to die for sinful man. Dale gave a strong invitation to the audience to receive God's gift, forgiveness through Jesus Christ. A small group of young people accepted the invitation.

After the concert, Jim Stipich, who played acoustic guitar, spent time explaining the gospel to the younger children. (...unless you turn and become like children, you will never enter the kingdom of heaven... Mt. 18:3) He later explained to me that he'd been through Marxism, TM, and drugs, and in his four years with Jesus, he has found true peace. Gary Arthur told of his desire to impart to the audience something lasting. He said, "Everyone will get a great emotional high from Leo Kottke tomorrow night, but what will they have when they leave?" In all, "The Way's" peace and happiness was apparent in their personalities, their music and their message.

Master Guitarist Leo Kottke

by Sari Bodi & Steve Brown

Pine Island String Band opened the Leo Kottke concert at Memorial Auditorium last Thursday night. The local group received a warm reception from their Burlington fans.

Guitarist Jim Mahoney described their musical repetoire as "a mixture of bluegrass and swing with some original songs." He also pointed out that their instruments aren't electrified and that those bands with electric guitars, etc. shouldn't be classified as actual bluegrass.

The program produced the variety of sounds Mahoney described. "Banks of the Ohio" and "Home Sweet Home Revisited" were both mellow bluegrass tunes with "barbershop" harmony.

"Moxey and Gin," a song bass player Jim McGuinness wrote, was the type of blues one might hear from a restless hero in a 1940's movie: "No one ever gave you a valentine. I thought you were mine, oh mine."

Country music of the square dance variety combined with "swing" in a song called "Fiddlin' Around" sounded like a comic rendition of "Turkey in the Straw." The violinist also displayed his fiddlin' ability in "Orange Blossom Special," an imitation of a train "comin' down the tracks."

"Tango's Banjo" spotlighted the banjo player's finger-picking talent. The rapidly moving fingers paused intermittently throughout the song to provide a sharp contrast to the flowing melody.

"Choo-choo de Boogie" brought the Pine Island set to a close with a "big band" number of the Glen Miller type. By this time the band appeared to have completely loosened up and enjoyed the song as much as the audience.

Performing in Memorial Auditorium may have frightened the musicians at first, because they are used to audiences who dance along rather than sit and listen. The absence of their female vocalist didn't seem to hurt them either.

The Pine Island String Band has an album coming out on Philo Records, some of the songs of which were played at the concert. As guitarist Mahoney said, "you should support local talent."

Leo Kottke

Leo Kottke's voice grumbles at you, his two twelve string guitars glisten at you, and when he starts to fly across his strings it is obvious that your mesmerism is due to the fact that you are watching one of the finest guitarists in the world.

Memorial Auditorium appeared to be at near capacity as the musician from Takoma, Washington took his place in front of the wall of microphones. No drummer, no organ, nobody but one man and his guitars. The sound was amazingly full and there were times when I could have sworn that there were other musicians.

Although there does seem to be a good deal of repetition to Kottke's music, it should be noted that this is no drawback. His music is interspersed with enjoyable anecdotes concerning his family, music and background; it flows, he flows and his fingers hum.

The great thing about the performance was that you felt that he was playing for himself to make you happy. He wasn't promoting an album and he had no reason to be showing off his talent; he is terrific. He played such well known tunes as "Louise," "Yesterday's Gone," and "Guess I Owe it All to Pamela Brown." Many people feel that Kottke sounds much better in concert than on his albums: all six of them. I found this to be true, even in Memorial.

One of Kottke's stories is well worth passing on to the reader. I don't have it exact, but it's close.

"One day, my daughter, who is somewhere between 3 months and 4 years old, came up to me and told me one of her friends had been in the hospital."

"I said, 'Oh'."

"She said this friend had been given ice cream and milkshakes and all sorts of great sweets."

"I said, 'Oh.' Then I asked her what was wrong with her friend."

"She looked at me and said her friend had had her testicles removed. Why not, huh?"

Kottke just sat up there, we all laughed, and another piece began. It really was an excellent night and Leo's relaxing Burlington show was a radical relief after a weekend which had been filled with so much insane audience hype.

Don Owens to Perform at Billings Round Room

by Sari Bodi

Folksinger Don E. Owens will be performing at the Billings' Round Room tomorrow night at 8:30.

Originally from Racine, Wisconsin, Owens has haphazardly made his way to Vermont via such places as Nashville, Greenwich Village, and Germany. His instramental accomplishments include the saxophone, piano, and harmonica as well as the guitar. Owens jokingly said that he has considered creating a one-man-band of the type he's seen in Germany. He described a particular show on a streetcorner where the man was not only equipped with the usual apparatus of a one-man-band, (cymbols between knees, drums, horn), but had rigged a curtain which he opened and closed between each song.

While in Europe this past summer, Owens played in Amsterdam and Germany. Although he sang mainly to Dutch and German-speaking audiences, he said that the language barrier didn't present any problems because the people in Europe really enjoy American music. He added that German rock is developing but it is in its infant stage. His manager in Germany is presently planning a tour for him to begin in January.

Owens' experiences in Racine included playing harmonica with "Johnny Young and the Southside Chicago Blues Band." When Johnny Young asked him to tour the east coast with the band, Owens declined because he wanted to finish high school.

After high school, he brought his guitar and the songs he'd written to various places. When he reached Greenwich Village, he found it to be "a pretty burnt-out place." "I was disappointed," he said. "A lot of the musicians weren't very good. You could go to a club at 3:00 in the morning and hear some dynomite jazz bands, but aside from that, it's not the same place it used to be." In Greenwich Village, he played at several location, one of the better known of which is the "Bitter End."

Don Owens

Owens said that big cities depress him, so that when a member of "Van Guard" records advised him to remain in New York to establish a following, he couldn't do it. "I need to go to the country to mellow out after I've been in a big city for too long," he said.

He viewed his experiences in the country-western musical capital, Nashville, Tenn., in a humourous light. "When you go to a park in Nashville on a Sunday afternoon, you see what seems like 50 million guitar players and they're all really good. I had written some country- western songs while kidding around in imitation of the typical ones you hear. A company liked them and offered me a job as a staff writer. This job entails sitting in an office and producing a certain quota of songs per month. This is why commercial country-western music all sounds the same."

Don Owens has written 120 songs as well as published a book of poems titled Recent Poems. "Woody Guthrie wrote about 2,000 songs," he said, "so I have a ways to go." A stanza from his most recent song, "Somewhere in the Ruins", reflects his dislike of big cities:

"all the people in the city have sold their souls to neon dreams there's no compassion, only pity nothing is the way it seems And when two people try to rise above all the hatred, all the pain they realize they don't know the first thing about love somewhere in the ruins again."

Bailey Library Needs Addition

by Mary Partridge

Things seem to be the same at Bailey Library this year, except it is even harder to find an unoccupied desk and all the easy chairs have been taken away (because they had exposed tacks). Plans for a major change are underway. On December 5th, the trustees will be presented with a report from the Library Planning Council and an architect's model and schematic drawings of the proposed addition to the library.

"When you plan a library expansion, you plan for 15 to 20 years," said David Pilachowski, a reference librarian, who is a member of the Library Planning Council. "Taking into account our growing collections and the increasing enrollment at the University, we need an addition twice as large as Bailey," he said. But the money required to build an addition of that size is simply unavailable. "We're not eligible for Federal funds to build the addition," said Pilachowski, "and the University doesn't have that kind of money."

The compromise solution to the problem of financing the twenty-year addition is to build only for the next 8 to 10 years, and worry about further expansion when the time comes. "The trustees will be presented with plans for the 20 year addition," said Pilachowski, "but expansion will be outlined in several steps. The amount of money that can be allocated for the addition depends on what the trustees say in December. The trustees will also decide when the addition is to be built." The trustees do not have to be convinced that Bailey Library is no longer adequate for they recognize the need for an addition.

Bailey Library was built in 1961 when UVM enrollment was 3600; there are now 8,200 students, and the library has desk space for 860. "We need more reader space," said Pilachowski, "but we can't take out any stacks." The first phase of the addition will be to increase desk space to 1600.

A national library study concluded that stacks become "unworkable" when they are over 85 percent full. "We are already full in special collections, maps, reserve, reference, and periodicals," he said. Older issues of periodicals and the rarely used oversized books are stored in a University-owned building downtown. The reserve and reference areas are getting more stacks in December.

The addition will contain many new services and it will result in the improvement of old services. There will be a diversity in the types of seating such as big tables, individual desks, arm chairs, and padded desk chairs, as well as soundproof typing cubicles, group study rooms for four to six people, a coffee area with tables and vending machines, and an audio/visual section with cassettes, slide and movie projectors. Other than adding a person for the audio/visual department, the library staff is not expected to increase with the completion of the addition.

The expansion will be to the west, towards Royall Tyler and the Bookstore. A poll taken at the library last year, in which students were asked where on campus they were coming from, what part of the library they were using, and for how long, and where they were going afterwards, helped the architects, Robert Burley Associates, decide where to put the addition. The entrance to the present library will probably be closed, and the new doorway will be approximately where the Bookstore path meets the well-travelled walkway between Terrill Home Economics Building and Cook. "The tunnel will channel students into the new entrance," said Pilachowski.

A portion of whatever money is allocated for the addition will go towards upgrading the aesthetics and the "creature comforts" of the Bailey Library. The heating system in particular is going to be looked at.

Plans for the addition have not advanced far enough for the floor plan or a design for the exterior to be precisely determined. Architects will make blue prints after the trustees' meeting in early December. The addition will probably have four or five stories, with one underground level; it will probably be L-shaped, coming out towards Main Street; and the exterior is likely to be red brick. "The Bailey Library will keep its name, but the addition may have a name of its own," said Pilachowski. "If someone came along with enough money – we'd call it anything."

Decline In Aptitude Scores Deceptive

Washington, D.C. — Despite current concern over declines in scores on college aptitude tests, there is no evidence of "a massive slide-off in the basics," a prominent educator asserts.

Fred T. Wilhelms, former executive secretary of the Association for Supervision and Curriculum Development; declares: "The worst that can be said is that we may have come down a little from the crest of the mid sixties, leaving us still well above any prior time."

Wilhelms then lists the "trade-offs" — improvements in the schools today he says more than make up for the possible slight declines in academic accomplishments.

The former education association executive presents his views in the November-December issue of the National Education Association journal, Today's Education. In a companion article, the president of Johns Hopkins University accepts the premise that educational standards are dipping, then offers five reasons why they are difficult to maintain in the modern American system of mass education.

While Wilhelms conjectures that public discontent over test scores may largely be resentment of change in education and a longing for familiar old-fashioned content combined with rigid discipline, he does acknowledge that "a quick survey showed that there is some reason to suspect a slippage in the past decade" in educational achievement.

In a closer look at several evidences of decline, the educator either finds reasons to hold the results in doubt or basic explanations of why the minor declines have come about. For example, he explains the drop in science test scores as follows:

"In the youth movements of the past decade, one prominent feature has been a revulsion against all things technological. For a few years after Sputnik, young people went for the tremendous emphasis on science; then they began moving away from the sciences and toward the humanities and things of the spirit...This does not make a decline any more palatable in a society which greatly needs scientific-technological insight and skill but it may very well mean that the problem centers in the priorities of our young people not in the deterioration in the quality of instructional programs."

Among the things that happened to youth "on the road to 1975," Wilhelms lists disillusionment with the war in Vietnam, a massive alienation from the old establishment, formation of youthful countercultures, revulsion against materialism and careerism, a driving quest for new life-styles, a new morality, and a new mode of relationships among groups and between individuals.

The writer suggests several "trade-offs" or gains he believes the schools have made that outweigh possible academic losses. For instance, "If student motivation has waned a bit in the sciences, should we not balance into the equation the enormous strides we are taking in the humanities?"

Wilhelms argues that the tremendous problems facing education relate to "fitting ourselves to the spirit and needs of our times."

"I see no sense in a hysterical retreat into old-style formalistic hammering at a few tool skills, coupled with an authoritarian rigidity of discipline," Wilhelms says. "The problems don't lie on that line, and neither do the solutions."

Nevertheless, he suggests there is "no great reason why parents should not be offered a variety of conservative options—along with the more liberal ones—if they want them." Although a few groups "may go off the deep end, back to the oppressive dullness and occasional callousness which once prevailed," the "plain common sense" and good training of most teachers and administrators will reduce the risks.

In the accompanying article, President Steven Muller of Johns Hopkins University lists these "fundamental reasons why standards in the modern American system of mass education are extremely difficult to maintain":

1. People have talents as diverse as their personalities, and great numbers of them cannot be educated to the same level. "For the sake of being able to pretend that all young people are equal not only under God and under law but also in talent, the American society may permit very low average standards in mass education."

2. One can be educated in many of the refinements of civilization without being skilled for specialized employment – and more important–the reverse is true. As the society became technologically much more sophisticated the emphasis on development of vocational skills has become more pronounced in school curriculums. At the same time, standards of general education were allowed to erode.

3. Mass education cannot assume mass motivation. "Lack of motivation may well be the most serious ill besetting the public school system. The only cure is revived recognition that learning cannot be forced on the unmotivated or hostile, that instructors generally are not trained to instill motivation, that the

Continue The Boycott

In 1973 when the United Farm Worker contracts expired, the growers signed "sweetheart contracts" with the teamsters behind the backs of the farm workers. Up until the U.F.W. organized the grape and lettuce workers in California, the teamsters had shown no interest in them. The United Farm Workers is a union of and for farm workers. The teamsters were called in by the growers to destroy the United Farm Workers Union.

According to a recent Harris survey, 17 million Americans are boycotting scab lettuce, grapes, and wines. Because of the strength of the boycott against scab lettuce, grapes and Gallo wine, the growers finally agreed to the passage of the Brown Bill. The Brown bill guarantees free and open elections so that the worker can choose his own union. However, a law is only as good as its enforcement. The Brown Bill guarantees free and open access to the fields for all Unions participating in the election. This provision is not being enforced; 300 UFW organizers have been arrested by the local sheriffs for talking to workers in the fields. The head of a large grower's association in California has been quoted as saying that property rights are more important than civil rights and he intends to try this theory in the courts.

Despite the vigilant attacks and arrests of UFW organizers and supporters, the United Farm Workers have won close to 70% of all the ballots cast. On farms where the UFW already had contracts, they won overwhelmingly.

Winning elections does not guarantee contracts. Many of our victories are being challenged in the courts by the grower-teamster combination. Because of the arrests of many of our organizers and the harassment by teamster goons and vigilante groups, many other elections are still undecided. The boycott has been our best weapon. For this reason, we are asking everyone concerned with justice and the plight of the farm workers to CONTINUE THE BOYCOTT.

Anyone interested in more information or in joining the struggle can contact the Vermont United Farm Workers' Support Committee at 864-6728.

Governor Salmon ,

by Wendy Pierro

Governor Salmon was on the University of Vermont's campus last Friday afternoon. I called Salmon's secretary to find out the purpose of his visit to UVM, and she said, it was a coup, and that Salmon was going to take over the University, and succeed Lattie Coor, our new president.

Of course, she was only joking.

The Governor was invited to sit in on a "Soviet East-West Trade" workshop sponsored by UVM and the Russian and East European Center for language, held at the L/L Center. At 3:00, Salmon was the guest of an informal discussion with about 20 students, held in the Billings Center Conference room. Salmon was asked how the State budget cuts will affect UVM's present quality of education.

The governor has already impounded $100,000 from UVM's budget, and proposed to cut an additional $600,000. Salmon felt that any further budget cuts will be a new decision and have to be based on further evaluations by the state legislature, in January.

The Governor holds a positive perception about UVM, but like other institutions, it will have to run on a very fiscally aware basis, in the future. Salmon thought that VPIRG was a credible force on campus. He has been supportive of VPIRG's projects, especially their current program preventing the decay of children's teeth in Vermont.

"I'm together with VPIRG about 60-65 percent of the time, but I criticize certain issues that show research of a lesser quality that I would hope."

The governor was asked what the fiscal state of Vermont was. "The State of Vermont might be running the risk of having a 1/2 million dollar deficit for next year if we don't pay our bills." The legislature "handcuffed" the governor's power to impound any additional amount from State spending, without approval from the Emergency Board. "The legislature feels that prosperity is just around the corner, and they wish to meet a balanced economy, without any further budget cuts or tax increases. It's now up to the legislature to bear the bone, but I don't want to pervail over this state if we ignore our problems."

Salmon noted that the country was plagued by the "re-election syndrome", politicians say what people want to hear rather than the priorities at hand that must be dealt with, sooner or later.

Governor Salmon remained tentative on his political plans for the future. "I will either run for the US Senate, or for re-election as governor." The governor ended with a comment "the buck doesn't stop here", expressing that he would like to talk with students at UVM again, but on an issue other than the budget

State University College at Oneonta, New York, in cooperation with Hebrew University, Haifa University, and Bar-Ilan University in Israel, and the Department of Education and Culture of the Jewish Agency, is offering its tenth academic program in Israel in July and August, 1976. The overseas program will be for a six week period and will award six semester hours of credit to students completing the academic work satisfactorily.

"Modern Israel" is for students who desire an intensive study of Israel's economic, social, political, religious, educational, and scientific institutions; an opportunity for research on a particular aspect of the country; and a humanizing broadening contact with old-new Israel.

Participation for both courses is limited to teachers, and undergraduate and graduate students who can meet the entrance requirements of the State University of New York, and who have a serious purpose for participating. There are no language requirements.

Dr. Yonah Alexander, Professor in International and Foreign Area Studies of the State University College at Oneonta, will be the Director of this program for the tenth consecutive summer. During the 1968-69 and 1969-70 academic years he was Resident Director for the full-year State University of New York programs in Israel at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem and the Tel Aviv University.

Persons desiring further information may write Professor Alexander at State University College, Oneonta, New York, 13820, or the Department of Education and Culture of the Jewish Agency, 515 Park Avenue, New York, New York 10022. As only a limited number of enrollees will be accepted, early application is recommended.

Reform Act Too Severe

by Allan Rabinowitz

(CPS)—There are those who say that law and order are just code words for repression and bigotry. This is dangerous nonsense. Law and order are code words for goodness and decency...the only way to attack crime in America is the way crime attacks our people--without pity.--President Richard Nixon, introducing the original draft of Senate Bill 1, March 14, 1973.

Imagine a law that could put the New York Times editors who received the Pentagon Papers in jail for seven years but acquit virtually all the Watergate criminals because they claimed they had mistakenly thought that their illegal acts were officially authorized. Imagine that and you have captured one of the many controversial features of the Criminal Justice Reform Act of 1975, commonly known as SB 1.

SB 1, now under consideration by the Senate Judiciary Committee under the leadership of John McClellan (D-AR), was originally intended to update and reform the US Criminal Code. Instead, the massive bill would leave the American public with a legacy of the Nixon "law and order" administration.

Under the proposed code, the death penalty would be restored for treason, sabotage and murder under a wide variety of circumstances.

The 1968 anti-riot law, which makes it a crime to cross state lines to incite a riot, would be redrafted. A "riot" could involve as few as ten people who create a "grave danger of imminently causing" damage to property. But at the same time, a person could be convicted for committing a crime that was provoked or incited by a police agent. In this case, the "incitement to riot" provision does not apply to the police agent. The burden would be on the defendant to prove "unlawful entrapment" by that agent.

Under SB 1, possession of the slightest amount of marijuana carries a sentence of 30 days and/or a $10,000 fine. For a second offense, the jail term jumps up to six months.

Under the new act, wiretapping authority would be greatly expanded. The government could impose 48-hour "emergency" wiretaps without court approval and direct telephone companies and landlords to cooperate "forthwith and unobtrusively" with the wiretappers.

The insanity defense in a trial would be greatly limited under the act.

Under the "Official Secrets Act" sections, the definition of espionage is expanded. Disclosing "national defense information" to unauthorized persons is a crime. "National defense information" goes beyond that information which is classified, covering almost every aspect of military and intelligence activities.

SB 1 is the paradoxical result of early efforts to reform and update the many archaic measures found in the huge US criminal code. President Lyndon Johnson appointed a commission in 1966 to study and overhaul the criminal code. That body, the National Commission on Reform of Criminal Law, was chaired by former California Governor Pat Brown, and submitted its final report to President Nixon in 1971.

But President Nixon had the bill rewritten by Attorney General John Mitchell and his successor Richard Kleindienst. Later Senators John McClellan and Roman Hruska (R-NB), leaders on the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures, consolidated the Brown Commission version and the Nixon version into the current SB 1. The new bill resembles the Nixon administration's version much more than it does that of the Brown Commission.

In nine years, the original intent of the Brown Commission has been diluted and altered. Louis Schwartz, director of the Brown Commission, accused the Nixon interpretation of contradicting "in every respect" the original recommendations for reforming the criminal code. He labeled the Nixon proposal a "program of primitive vengefulness."

The Senate Judiciary Committee will probably vote on SB 1 before Christmas. Although President Ford has endorsed the criminal code bill as it stands, some of the senators who co-sponsored th. bill are having second thoughts. Birch Bayh (D-IN) has withdrawn his sponsorship. Even Hruska, a staunch conservative and one of the bill's chief supporters, has recently indicated a willingness to amend some of the "official secrets" sections.

But critics of the bill are still wary.

"The willingness of the bill's proponents to compromise," said an associate director of the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), "is likely to result in amendments that will make the bill, while still not acceptable to us, just palatable enough to receive majority support...on the Senate floor."

The only answer, insist the ACLU and other critics, is a complete scrapping of SB 1.

NAS Supports American Indians

The Native American Solidarity Committee of Vermont will be holding its first meeting on December 3 at 7:30 at the P.A.C.T. office in Burlington (95½ North Street). Anyone who is interested in supporting Native people in their struggles is invited.

The Native American Solidarity committee is a newly formed national organization of individuals and groups who are united by our support for Indian struggles. Some of these struggles are a matter of survival. The culture and lifestyle of native people, which has helped them endure great hardships since 1492, is in eminent danger of extinction. Their lands and way of life is under heavy attack by the government and multinational corporations who are trying to take over their mineral rich lands. The Native American Solidarity committee recognizes the rights of Indians to control their own lives. We are committed to assist them in their struggles for decent jobs, health care education, land and treaty rights and respect for the Indian's culture and beliefs.

Anyone who is interested in donating staple foods, horsedrawn farm equipment, garden tools, or money should get in touch with us. For information, call Chester of the Native American Solidarity Committee at 864-6728.

Dorm Living

The Office of Residential Life has announced that some dormitory rooms will be available second semester. Director Stephen Peterson has said that resident halls will lose some students at the end of the semester.

Previously, because the halls were filled to capacity with a sizable surplus waiting for room assignments, off-campus students often had problems getting back on campus. This is not the situation this year. Therefore, no waiting list has been maintained for those students wanting accommodations.

Normal attrition between semesters in the past has ranged from 100 to 150. About 50 freshpersons will be admitted in January to fill some spaces. Consequently, some rooms will be available.

"We would like currently enrolled students, whom we've been unable to accommodate in the past, to have the first opportunity to let us know if they are interested in on-campus housing for the spring semester," he says. "This time we may be able to place them." Students wanting accommodations are encouraged to visit the Office possible.

Also, many on-campus students are interested in cancelling their housing contracts to move off campus. Housing contracts cannot be cancelled until dorm capacity has been reached. Housing contracts are year-long and as soon as capacity is reached students will be able to cancel contracts provided others desiring on campus housing will be able to fill these positions.

Annual Legislators Day

Members of the Legislature will be guests of the University of Vermont Student Association Monday, December 1 for an afternoon visit to the University and the Vermont – Dartmouth hockey game that evening.

The annual Legislators' Day will start with lunch at Billings Center on the University campus, where the senators and representatives will be greeted by UVM Interim President Wayne C. Patterson and SA President Staige Davis.

They will hear a presentation by Dr. John Moore, assistant vice president for academic affairs, on long-range planning at UVM, followed by tours of the campus with student guides.

The remainder of the afternoon will be devoted to visiting a variety of University programs and an informal reception with retired Senator George Aiken, UVM distinguished professor.

Following dinner the visiting legislators will be guests of the University at the Vermont – Dartmouth hockey game at Gutterson Field House.

The invitation was issued by Davis to give the legislators an opportunity to "better understand the University." The program was started in 1971 by the Student Association and usually attracts between 30 and 50 members of the House and Senate.

entertainment potential of the instructional process is limited, and that discipline must be restored."

4. Confusion between the right of access to education and the right "to education." "It is not possible to combine meaningful standards of academic achievement with no-fault concepts of education, under which students are held individually blameless if they fail to acquire an education while attending an educational institution even though they make no effort to learn and are incapable of functioning above a low level of intellectual competence."

5. The availability of a sufficient number of excellent teachers has always been a perennial problem for the public schools.

Muller concludes by emphasizing the importance of an educated and skilled citizenry in a society where popular participation has become virtually all-inclusive.

"Even the most critical assessment of declining standards represents no argument against the American experiment of unlimited educational opportunity for all the people," he emphasizes.

Tom Wicker Addresses Students

by Kathy Stiassni & Bruce Teifer

Wednesday evening, November 12, and Tom Wicker's arrival in Burlington marked the inauguration of the Richard Warner Memorial Speaker's Fund. The fund, established as a tribute to the late poli-sci professor at UVM, will invite speakers annually.

Tom Wicker, associate editor of the New York Times and recent advocate of prison reform, seemed a natural choice for an occasion commemorating Dick Warner, for both espoused humanist ideas. And Wicker fits Warner's definition of a liberal – a radical with a wife and children.

According to Wicker, there are some "remarkable facts" about the current recession, the first being public, and thus political, toleration of high unemployment. He noted that never since the great depression have so many been out of work, and citing Ford administration projections indicated more of the same for the remainder of the decade. But Wicker took his audience between the lines of such statistics. For instance, the 6-8% unemployment predicted by Ford economists translates into twice that figure for adult black workers, 20% for white teenagers, and 40% for their black peers.

Even an optimistic interpretation of these statistics leaves one in three, or 33% of the black teenage population unemployed through 1980, a prediction that Wicker correlates to the rising crime rate. He went one step further to say that the astronomical crime rate is peculiar to our society. He advocated closing the gap between affluence and poverty by such means as heavier taxation of the rich and "some redistribution of wealth through the public sector, e.g., free subways in New York City and a rebuilding of the nation's rail system by youth," which would have ecological as well as economic benefits. Wicker admitted that "change is not as simple as I make it sound."

During the question and answer period following his talk, he failed to respond to a query on prison reform, commenting "that's the topic of my other speech." And while answering another question from the floor concerning the ownership of the New York Times, namely that the Chase Manhattan Bank is the largest single stockholder, Wicker was adamant in his response that this in no way affected the editorial position of his paper. He was also asked to comment on the plight of the unpaid millions of women who work in the home, "the Housewife Problem," he called it. Judging from these and other questions put to him, it seemed obvious that the audience expected something more of Wicker. This may be a consequence of Wicker saving his passion for his writing.

Nevertheless, Tom Wicker emphasized the need for U.S. citizens to make a personal commitment, and this appeal to the audience as individuals reflected Richard Warner's spirit and efforts to strengthen the bonds among the university community.

Thanksgiving, as we celebrate it today, is a day when everyone reunites with their family. It's a short vacation when we can all get caught up on sleep, drink wine, and gorge on pumpkin pie and turkey. It is a short, happy period of relaxation to renew us with life so we can make it through 'til Christmastime.

Unfortunately, we have forgotten how Thanksgiving originated and, except for the feasting, we have lost its true spirit. Thanks was first given in America by the Pilgrims, who landed on the desolate coast of New England in 1620. They lived here throughout the winter with a limited supply of food. Needless to say, many died of sickness and starvation. Finally, with the approach of spring, crops were planted and were harvested in the early fall.

The Pilgrims were dependent on this crop for survival and had it not produced an abundant supply of food to carry them through the winter months, they all would have died. Our Day Of Thanks

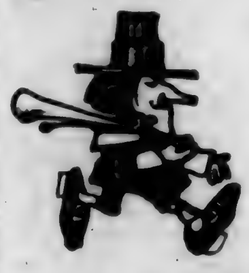
Thanksgiving, as we celebrate it today, is a day when everyone reunites with their family. It's a short vacation when we can all get caught up on sleep, drink wine, and gorge on pumpkin pie and turkey. It is a short, happy period of relaxation to renew us with life so we can make it through 'til Christmastime.

Unfortunately, we have forgotten how Thanksgiving originated and, except for the feasting, we have lost its true spirit. Thanks was first given in America by the Pilgrims, who landed on the desolate coast of New England in 1620. They lived here throughout the winter with a limited supply of food. Needless to say, many died of sickness and starvation. Finally, with the approach of spring, crops were planted and were harvested in the early fall.

The Pilgrims were dependent on this crop for survival and had it not produced an abundant supply of food to carry them through the winter months, they all would have died. The people rejoiced, and Bradford, their governor, announced a day of thanksgiving, to thank the Lord for giving them the food necessary for survival.

The day of Thanksgiving turned out to be a week long feast. All the men went out and hunted wild fowl. Turkeys and geese happened to be in their prime at this season, so more were caught than any other birds. This is how the tradition of eating turkey on Thanksgiving originated. Cellars were filled with apples, parsnips, carrots, and other vegetables that had been grown in the summer. Everyone, including the friendly Indians nearby, contributed food to the huge feast. All ate well, for they knew the fast approaching winter would provide little food.



This day of Thanksgiving was not proclaimed merely because of this one meal. In fact, for a long time there was a great controversy about the day on which Thanksgiving should be celebrated. Two years later there was another day of thanksgiving.

In the summer of 1622, the Pilgrims' crops failed because of a drought and the entire colony was without food. Again, many died. The governor announced that there be a day of fasting for everyone in order to conserve on food.

At that time Miles Standish returned from his voyage and brought plenty of food for all. He also announced that a ship was coming from Holland bringing more food and people. The Pilgrims felt they had been blessed with food enough for survival, and again a day of Thanksgiving was appointed. It was held on July 30, 1622.

Because of the difference in these two dates there was always an argument concerning the day on which Thanksgiving would publicly be acknowledged. For many years, the states each announced a separate day of Thanksgiving for their particular state.

The day that Thanksgiving is celebrated on is not important. What is important is that people today remember the significance of Thanksgiving during this season. Thanksgiving was essentially the birth of America. The celebration constitutes the optimism that our first ancestors had in creating a New World. It was a celebration of survival for those who had endured the many days of fast. Most importantly, it signified the courage and strength of our ancestors.

Vegetarianism-Thoughts On Meat And Milk

by Ginny Sickles and Cindy Thesli Living/Learning
Nutrition Program

In recent years there has been a growing interest and concern about the frequently misunderstood lifestyle of the vegetarian. There is a wide gap existing between those who are partial vegetarians and those who are vegetarians, consuming neither the flesh of an animal nor the products from it such as eggs and milk.

As you can see, because there is such a wide spectrum of persons who consider themselves vegetarians, a basic definition of vegetarianism would be inadequate. What is needed is a better understanding of "why" and a look at the facts and practical aspects involved in deciding to go the vegetarian route.

There are obviously many reasons why people choose to not eat meat. Some are purely personal such as revulsion over the idea of slaughtering an animal. Others are concerned about harmful properties or components of meat, ecological reasons, money and occasionally, spiritual reasons.

Feelings towards killing animals for meat reflect personal values and the decision not to eat meat need not rest on any factual basis. However for those of you contemplating the turn towards vegetarianism for health and ecological reasons the facts involved have oftentimes become distorted and perhaps need to be reexamined.

The belief that meat is in itself harmful because of the cholesterol and saturated fatty acids associated actually has little scientific basis. As mentioned in the last article, cholesterol is a necessary component of our metabolic system and the battle over saturated and unsaturated fatty acids has yet to be resolved. The concern over various additives in meat, such as nitrates and nitrites as possible carcinogens, merits considerable attention as we attempt to evaluate "what we're eating."

The statement that it takes 8 pounds of grain to add 1 pound to a beef animal and therefore we should all eliminate meat from our diet to cut down on this wasteful consumption of protein is not as simple as it might appear. The use of grain for animal feeding is two-fold. First efficiency of weight gain is greater than with range feeding and secondly, meat eaters have developed a preference for the tender high-fat beef associated with grain fed cattle. Although beef cattle utilize grain as part of their diet, a large part of their diet comes from grass and other forages that grow on land too poor to grow conventional crops for direct human consumption. Also the same quality of protein cannot be derived from grain as from beef.

Protein from animal sources is complete in that it contains all of the 8 essential amino acids required to rebuild the protein components (i.e. enzymes, antibodies, etc.) necessary to carry on the metabolic processes of the body. In contrast vegetable proteins are usually incomplete and require certain combinations to provide the same quality of protein contained in animal products. By combining whole grains such as rice and wheat with legumes such as beans you can obtain protein with quality comparable to that of meat.

With the high cost of meat, alternative sources of protein from vegetables as a partial substitute for our protein needs can possibly lower the amount we pay to eat and provide new and exciting experiences for our palate.

One other important consideration is the role of milk products and eggs in our diets. Both are extremely good sources of high quality protein, but even more importantly, they provide a broad spectrum of other necessary nutrients, especially calcium from milk. Within our bodies there is a balance between calcium and phosphorus which should be about 1:1 in order for proper absorption of both to take place. Our growing intakes of soda and processed foods can greatly increase our phosphorus levels and for the most part we depend on milk as the main source of calcium. Obviously eliminating milk from our diet could have serious consequences since alternative sources of calcium are difficult to come by.

Vegetarianism has made us very aware of the importance of protein in our diets. Fats and carbohydrates have wound up the bad guys again since it is apparent that within the United States our protein intakes usually exceed our needs. It's very obvious that we live in an age where if enough is good, more is better. Contrary to popular belief, excessive protein intakes are not any more beneficial since the excess nitrogen is excreted and the carbon component is converted to an immediate source of energy or fat.

In essence, it remains our choice to obtain our protein needs as we wish. There are many valid and not so valid reasons for going the vegetarian route, but understanding how to go about it without subjecting your body to serious metabolic stress, in the form of various nutrient deficiencies is most important.

The Israeli Commune

by Em Barbanel

I walked off the bus into the hot noon-day sun. The settlement around me looked like your average suburban development, only the roads were dirt and not asphalt. Yet it was out in the middle of a farm oasis in the center of a desert.

I was to spend the next few months of my life in a commune-utopia, a self-sufficient, socialist world in a waste-land of sand. My mornings were full of chicken shit. You guessed it, I work in the chicken coop. What did I do? I shoveled shit and gathered eggs and shoveled shit and fed chickens and shoveled shit and cleared the chicks and shoveled shit and...In the afternoons the young ones came out and gossiped and played while the elder people slept. It was often interesting just to walk down the block just to hear who did what with whom and who thought what about it. In the evenings there were parties and entertainment programs and I learned then about the communes of Israel.

There are three types of communes in Israel: the Kibbutz, the Moshav, and the Moshavah. The former is the most left leaning institution and the latter, the least. On the kibbutz each person or couple has a house when they are over eighteen. All the children live in coed dormitories. The kibbutz, like all of the communes there, is totally self-sufficient. Everyone has a job. The old people do what they can, and the young ones attend schools which generally are run by the members of the commune, and everyone else works at whatever he is trained to do or in the fields and the nursery regardless of his sex.

The profits are shared equally by the members of the kibbutz and everyone is assured of getting what he needs to live on. The moshav is similar. There are also community fields and shared profits, but the striking differences are that each family has a house, and

by Wendy Pierro

At 398 Pine St., four people make a ton and a half of cheesecake a week. Dick and Susan Callahan, Tom Merill and Steve Ellis make cheesecakes, while listening to classical pieces of Beethoven, Bach, and music from the 1936 era of Louis Armstrong. Dick feels the accompaniment of music makes their Vermont Velvet Cheesecake bloom into its full essence. I stood out of the way, and watched a 65 pound mixer blend the cheese, and a 35 pound mixer blend the crust, while ovens were preheated. Dick made sure that I didn't copy down the recipe, for he thought that I was a spy from Sara Lee.

Cheesecake, a popular, rich dessert, was first created by the Romans, who used a mixture of eggs and cheesecurds, added honey and sesame seeds. In the US, cheesecake started as crusted mixtures of American cream cheese, sugar and citrus flavor. Lindy's, a restaurant in New York City, had a well-known reputation for their famous Lindy cheesecake.

Vermont Velvet cheesecake is made from a basic Lindy recipe. It contains a filling of neufchatel cheese, cream cheese, sugar, whole eggs, whey, flour, salt and pure vanilla extract. The crust is made from Graham crackers and butter. Vermont Velvet is sold at a few restaurants in Burlington.

"Cheesecake is a wonderful food full of eggs and cream cheese," said Phyllis Sole, a home economics professor at UVM. It's a high protein and high fat dessert with about 450 calories per slice. Cheesecake is my favorite dessert. This is my recipe for cheesecake.

Pooh's Cheesecake

6 eggs separated
2 pounds neufchatel cheese
1 pound cream cheese
1 cup sugar
1 cup of sour cream
1 tablespoon of vanilla
2 tablespoons of flour

Beat egg yolks until thick, gradually beat in sugar, break up cream cheese, add to egg mixture, beating until smooth. Add sour cream, flour and vanilla; continue beating till smooth. Beat egg whites until stiff but not dry, fold into cheese mixture. Heat oven to 275 F, and butter a 9-inch spring pan. Dust with a mixture of 1/4 cup of graham cracker crumbs, 1 tbsp. sugar, 1/4 tsp. of cinnamon and nutmeg. Pour filling into the pan and bake 70 minutes. Turn off the oven and leave in for one hour. Remove, cool and top with fruit filling. C'est formidable!

Dylan At The Shelburne Inn

The small back porch off the rear of the kitchen at Shelburne Inn groaned under the weight of several employees as they crowded on to it. They were watching as two large Charter Buses pulled into the rear parking lot. Unlike other buses that pulled in with French Canadians on ski tours or Senior citizens on foliage tours where the employees turned away and groaned pretending their non-existence, these buses were closely followed as they rambled into the parking lot. It was approximately 4:00 p.m. on Friday, the seventh day of November. A Mr. Bob Dylan and Co. had arrived on the scene. The employees stretched on tippy toes to catch a glimpse of the man. Suddenly one waitress said she saw him, pointing her finger at a small figure emerging from a red Eldorado Cadillac. Two members of the tour were walking just below the porch and upon hearing her exclaim, asked her if he looked any different in real. She was embarrassed and giggled nervously, the two guys just kept walking.

The guests disappeared into their rooms and the employees reluctantly turned back to the kitchen. The manager stood there waiting for them. He gave them all explicit instructions that Mr. Dylan was not to be bothered.

Everyone settled back to work. The hostess went out to the dining room and started her duties at the register when she heard a voice from the front desk. Looking around the corner she saw a woman standing there with a teddy bear tucked under her arm. Obviously the desk clerk wasn't around so she approached the woman, asking her if she needed some help. The woman turned to face her and the hostess saw that it was none other than Joan Baez. She wanted to know a good place for a walk. Extremely friendly, Joan chattered with the hostess for a good fifteen minutes, then went on her way for a walk through the village.

Later that evening Mr. Dylan himself appeared in the bar. He sat facing his good friend Bobby Neuwirth, head tucked down, shoulders hunched. The security was tight, the whole bar completely closed off to the public. They had rented out the whole Inn and literally moved in as if it were some good friend's house they were visiting. Floating through the kitchen grabbing food on the way, meditating on the front porch and dining room floor.

At one point in the evening after the liquor had been flowing a while, the security loosened and a bold waitress moved up to Dylan on his bar stool asking him for his autograph. Slowly he turned to face her, coldly staring for a few minutes then, "what the hell ya gonna do with it? Frame it on your wall?" But of course he signed it. After doing so he turned to the bartender and complained loudly about being bothered by such things and "those" kinds of people. Much of that evening he spent sitting, just drinking (beer) and talking with Bobby Neuwirth. Around 1:00 a.m. he left, then suddenly showed up again around 5:00 a.m. for a couple of beers. Then he said he had to "catch some Z's" and back to his room. Several times during the evening he expressed his distaste for young tenny-boppers. (There was a group hanging out in the parking lot)

The next day we started serving breakfast at 12:00 noon and continued until six that evening. Not especially amazing considering they were still eating dinner at 2:00 a.m. the night before. Mr. Dylan himself didn't arise until around 4:00 p.m. Saturday afternoon, whereupon he was whisked away to Harbor Hide Away for further filming after eating a "breakfast" of fresh strawberries and melon which he frowned at disgustedly and demanded to leave the place. So he left, bus, tour and all to move on to the next town after the concert that nite. But wait,

TM: An Awakening Experience

by Hoss Bone

Have you ever tried to describe an experience to a friend, something that means alot to you – like climbing Camel's Hump on a clear Vermont day or skiing Tuckerman's Ravine in late spring – And noticed your friend was not sharing in your enthusiasm? At that point you realize that you can never describe a personal experience and expect the other person to feel it? It's true. It's one of those, "you had to be there" situations. Such is the case with Transcendental Meditation.

Four months ago I began T.M. A friend, curiosity, and an openness to a new experience led me to an introductory lecture. A list of my experiences would include:

1) A "looked forward to" 40 minutes a day with myself.

2) A deep rest for me mentally and physically.

3) Increased energy

4) A clarity of thought and values.

5) A determined focus in activity

6) An alertness, both mentally and physically

7) Personal behavior changes.

At first I didn't think I would be able to discipline myself to sit for 40 minutes a day. I realize now that my objections evolved from a feeling that I didn't value my daily activities enough to change them. It took discipline at first because it was a behavior change, but soon I found that I was looking forward to 20 minutes of meditation every morning and evening. At the time, I learned the technique of T.M. I was feeling a tenseness that I knew was not good for my body. I learned that through T.M. I could allow my body to "slow down". After 20 minutes of restful "slowdown" I experienced a definite increase in energy in my activity. The most obvious energy increase was during the evening. After meditating in the evening I have 5 or 6 hours of productive energy before going to bed. It is like experiencing two days of activity during the waking hours.

I have found that T.M. has not changed me as a person: it has allowed the person inside me to come to the surface. My thoughts are clearer; therefore, my values have become more obvious. This clarity spills over into my activity. Focus and concentration are words that come to mind. I can focus on my activity as never before, and my concentration has enabled me to raise the quality of my activity and helped me to feel good about myself. Self-doubts certainly still exist, but a new understanding penetrates them.

By way of personal statements, I have stopped biting my fingernails (which I did for 25 years) and there has been a substantial decrease in my use of alcohol. Neither of these changes were self-perpetuated; I just realized I hadn't had a beer in a week and that my fingernails need cutting. Amazing!

Anyway, T.M. is the experience I felt a need to describe and I realize that you could be not as excited about it as I am. I can only hope my description will spark your curiosity. If so, the International Meditation Society is located at 308 Main Street – across from Edmonds Junior High School.

Allow me to philosophize a moment. T.M. is a personal experience. All that I have just said is not speculation: it is truth; it is my experience. I believe that the simple technique of T.M. helps a person to free inner potential, feel good about himself and enjoy life more. If I had one wish for you it would be that. Get excited.

This is Part II of the two-part series dealing with the origins and treatment of syphilis. Syphilis is caused by a bacteria known as Treponema pallidum. It is spread by direct contact, in heterosexual or monosexual activity, with discharges from early lesions of the skin or mucous membranes or from contact with body fluids and secretions of infected persons.

It is, for all practical purposes, never transmitted from indirect contact by contaminated objects (such as toilet seats) and is only infrequently transmitted by kissing.

Approximately three weeks after contact, a small bump usually occurs at the site where the organism entered the body and this bump ulcerates to form a firm, rather dry ulcer which is completely painless. It, thus, may not be noticed unless it can be directly visualized. Even without specific treatment with penicillin, this lesion, called a chancre, will disappear in approximately four to six weeks.

Following this primary stage and appearing variable periods of time afterward from weeks to years, recurrent skin rashes occur which may also fade spontaneously without treatment. This stage is known as secondary syphilis and represents the spread of the infection throughout the body.

In later years of the infection (without treatment) destructive lesions commonly occur in the brain, the aorta, the bones, the skin ("Great Pox") and other body sites. This stage of the disease is called tertiary syphilis. Although primary and secondary syphilis do not shorten life or greatly impair health, this is not the case with the third stage of the disease.

The disease is communicable during primary and secondary stages, particularly at any time that a skin or mucous membrane lesion occurs, be it a chancre or a rash. Adequate treatment with penicillin during the infectious stages usually ends infectivity within 24 hours.

The lesions of tertiary syphilis cannot be treated with penicillin since they, in fact, represent structural damage to a tissue or an organ. It is uncertain just how long syphilis is communicable into the tertiary stage.

As noted, the treatment for the disease is penicillin. To this point, there are not known to be strains of the organism which are resistant.

There is no natural immunity to syphilis nor is there permanent immunity once an individual had had the disease. Specifically, this means he can get it over and over. Although effort is being devoted to developing a vaccine for syphilis, none is yet available.

Because the disease does not easily make itself known in the early stages, unless there is a chancre clearly visible, it is quite easy to be infected and not be aware that this has happened. It is for this reason that syphilis must be (by law) reported to local Health Departments.

From the Health Department, individuals with special training will meet with an infected individual and, with the patient's cooperation, develop a list of the patient's sexual contacts. He will then interview these contacts and see that they are examined for syphilis.

Individuals who do this type of case finding are well-trained not only in interview techniques, but in discreteness and in keeping names confidential as well. Certain studies have suggested that, with proper interviews, as many as two additional cases will be found for every one infected case.

Thus, if you think you have syphilis or might have been exposed to syphilis (or any other venereal disease, for that matter), you should seek medical help at once and not wait for signs or symptoms to occur.

In the past, there is no question that many individuals were afraid to consult a physician for help because of fear of the parents learning that they had requested help. However, many state legislatures have passed bills which, in essence, authorize a minor to give consent for the diagnosis and treatment of any venereal disease. The consent or knowledge of the parents or guardian is not required for such diagnosis or treatment.

Yankee Letter

Reprinted from The Vermont Cynic, Nov. 4, 1908.

Of all the letters of advice ever written to a young man just starting his college course, the following, sent by a father to his freshman son at Yale, and published in the Yale Alumni News, is very nearly the best that has found its way into print. Everyone of our subscribers will find it decidedly worth reading. The letter follows:

"I am writing a few things I meant to say to you when we took our last walk together, the day before you left for Yale. I intended to say them then, and I will even confess that I shamelessly inveigled you into taking a stroll on the quiet street that I might rehearse a carefully prepared bit of Chesterfield up-to-date; but somehow I could not seem to begin,-and, after all, perhaps I can write what was in my mind more freely and plainly than I could have spoken it.

"I think I had never realized before that I was getting old.

"Of course I have known that my hair is causing your mother much solicitude, and that I am hopelessly wedded to my pincenez while reading my daily paper, and at the opera; but in some incomprehensible way I had forgotten to associate these trifles with the encroachment of time. It was the sudden realization that you were about to become a freshman in the college from which, as it seems to me, I but yesterday was graduated, that 'froze the genial current of my soul,' and spared you my paternal lecture.

"Another thing, trifling in itself, opened my eyes to the fact of my advancing years. Some day it may be yours to know the pain, the unreasonable pain, that comes over a man to know that between him and his boy, and his boy's friends, an unseen but unassailable barrier has arisen, erected by no human agency; and to feel that while they may experience a vague respect, and even curiosity, to know what exists on your side of the barrier, you on your part would give all—wealth, position, influence, honor— to get back to theirs! All the world, clumsily or gracefully, is crawling over this barrier; but no one ever crawls back again!

"You have never seemed happy to be with me; you have worked with me, read and smoked with me, even played golf with me; but the subtle change in your attitude, the kindling of your eye when we met young men of your age, is the keenest pain that I have ever known; yet one which, God knows! I would not reproach you with. It explains what I used to see on my father's face and did not understand.

"And so, comfortably situated upon my side of the barrier, let me, my dear son, who have spared you so much elderly wisdom (more, I fear, because I have hitherto been blissfully unaware of my own seniority than from any conscious motive), let me, I say, indulge in a few customary paternal warnings to you at this time. I trust that they will not be hackneyed, and I know that they will be sincere.

"You will probably play cards in college; most men do,—I did. The gambling instinct in man is primordial. Kept under due bounds, if no useful, it is at least comparatively harmless. This is the very best that I or any honest man can say of it. I should be glad if you never cared to gamble; but I do not ask it. Assuming that you will, I do not insult you, and myself equally, by warning you against unfairness; to suppose you capable of cheating at cards is to suppose an impossibility. You could not do so without forfeiting the right ever to enter your home again. But some careless and insidious practices, not unknown in my day and class, savor to the upright mind of cheating, without always incurring its penalties.

"To play with men whom you know cannot afford to lose, and who must either cheat or suffer privation; to play when you yourself must win your bet to square yourself; that is, when you do not reasonably see how you are going to raise the money to pay providing you lose-this is a gambler's chance to which no gentleman will ever expose his fellow players.

"I ask nothing of you in the way of a declared position on religion. Your mother may have demanded more of you here—entreated more; I cannot. I ask but this: that you will give earnest, serious consideration to the fact that we exist on this planet for a shockingly brief fraction of Eternity; and that it behooves every man to diligently seek an answer to the great question, 'Why am I here?' and then, as best he can, to live up to the ideal enjoined by his answer. And if this carries you far, and if it leads you to embrace any of the great creeds of Christendom, this will be to your mother an unspeakable joy, and, perhaps, not less so to me; but it is a question that cannot be settled by the mere filial desire to please.

"Last of all, while you are in college, be of it and support its every healthful activity. I ask no academic honor your natural inclinations may not lead you to strive for; no physical supremacy your animal spirits may not instinctively reach out and grasp. You will, I presume, make the fraternity I made, and, I hope, the societies; you will probably then learn that your father was not always a dignified, bearded man in pincenez and frock coat, and that on his side of the barrier he cut not a few capers which, seen in the clear light of his summer, gain little grace. Yet, were he to live his life over again, he would cut the same, or worse.

"Finally, if you make any of the teams, never quit. That is all the secret of success. Never quit! If you can't win the scholarship, fight it out to the end of the examination. If you can't win your race, at least finish somewhere. If your boat can't win, at least keep pulling on your oars, even if your eyes glaze and the taste of blood comes into your throat with every heave. If you cannot make your five yards in football, keep bucking the line—never let up—if you can't see, or hear, keep plugging ahead. Never quit!" — Williams Record.

NATO Group Meets

Four representatives from NATO's EUROGROUP will be in Vermont Thursday, November 20, for a day of meetings and briefings on U.S. – European relations. The EUROGROUP is defined as "an informal grouping of European countries within the North Atlantic Alliance, established to provide a stronger and more cohesive European contribution to the common defence." The arrival of the EUROGROUP panel is particularly timely in light of the recent changes in President Ford's cabinet and the controversy of "detente" with the U.S.S.R.

The panel consists of Lieutenant General Eigil Hilmar Wolf of Denmark, formerly Chief of NATO Defense College; Mr. Petrus Buwalda, Deputy Permanent Representative of the Netherlands to the North Atlantic Council in Brussels; Mr. Crispin Tickell of the United Kingdom, a career officer with the British Diplomatic Service; and Mr. John Kimball, U.S. Regional Officer NATO Information Services.

The four men will hold an informal news conference and briefing for reporters and editors on Thursday, November 20 at 11:00 a.m. at the Office of Senator Patrick Leahy, 135 Church Street in Burlington. Please contact Donald Steffens at 863-2525 if you plan to attend.

eats there. Also on some there are private as well as community land. The moshavah is almost like a community made up of private little businesses making up the self-sufficient whole.

The country is colorful, the work hard but good and the people have a brave pioneering courage in this new country where socialism and the commune system work well.

Strange Eyes

The eyes of a passing stranger.
A connection is made, then broken.
four eyes – lock – then unlock.
eyes are one, then four again.

That gleam, that light of purity.
It shines from the eyes of people.
It shines from the sun, and the dew, and the stars, and from the streets of a city at dusk;

from this city,
with its mountain and lake,
of blue, green, grey, and ice, especially the ice.

Eyes, shining on the streets pervade into the darkness of night.
A cat, a light,
and a vibrating paddle, become one in an eye.

...Dylan At Shelburne

they had reserved the Shelburne Inn for 2 nights – possibly a week, and now expected to leave after paying only for one nite. Dylan's accountant worked with the Inn's for 6 hours before a compromise was met. Even then they came out ahead.

They were an extremely high strung bunch of people. Some of the groupiss couldn't even see the floor, their noses were stuck so high in the air. Demanding and selfish in everything I can only say I was not impressed. Obviously they are not any happier with all that fame and fortune.

So be it said...

THE END OF THE DOUBLE STANDARD.

OUR LEAST EXPENSIVE RECEIVER HAS THE SAME LOW DISTORTION AS OUR MOST EXPENSIVE RECEIVER.

IM Distortion Comparison

	YAMAHA	Brand "A"	Brand "B"	Brand "C"
CR-1000	.1%	.1%	.15%	.3%
CR-800	.1%	.3%	.3%	.5%
CR-600	.1%	.5%	.5%	.8%
CR-400	.1%	1.0%	.9%	1.0%

With most manufacturers, price determines quality. However, as the above chart shows, you can see how Yamaha alone offers the same quality (low distortion) throughout our entire line, regardless of price.

At Yamaha, we make all our stereo receivers to a single standard of excellence.

A consistently low intermodulation distortion of just 0.1%!

A figure you might expect only from separate components. Maybe even from our $650 receiver, the CR-1000.

But a figure you'll surely be surprised to find in our $330 receiver, the CR-400.

So what's the catch?

There is no catch. Simply a different philosophy. Where high quality is spelled low distortion.

You'll find Yamaha's single-mindedness particularly gratifying when compared to the amount of distortion other manufacturers will tolerate throughout their product lines. (See chart.)

Particularly gratifying and easily explained.

Less of what irritates you most.

While other manufacturers are mostly concerned with more and more power, Yamaha's engineers have concentrated on less and less distortion.

Particularly intermodulation (IM) distortion, the most irritating to your ears. By virtually eliminating IM's brittle dissonance, we've given back to music what it's been missing.

A clear natural richness and brilliant tonality that numbers alone cannot describe. A new purity in sound reproduction.

A musical heritage.

Our seeming preoccupation with low distortion, in general, and the resulting low IM distortion, in particular, stems from Yamaha's own unique musical heritage.

Since 1887, Yamaha has been making some of the finest musical instruments in the world. Pianos, organs, guitars, woodwinds, and brass.

You might say we're music people first.

With our musical instruments, we've defined the standard in the production of fine sound. And now, with our entire line of receivers and other stereo components, we've defined the standard of its reproduction.

Four different receivers, built to one standard.

Between our $330 CR-400 and our $650 CR-1000, we have two other models.

The $460 CR-600 and the $580 CR-800.

Since all are built with the same high quality and the same low distortion, you're probably asking what's the difference.

The difference is, with Yamaha, you only pay for the power and features that you need.

Unless you have the largest, most inefficient speakers, plus a second pair of the same playing simultaneously in the next room, you probably won't need the abundant power of our top-of-the-line receivers.

Unless you're a true audiophile, some of the features on our top-of-the-line receivers might seem a bit like gilding the lily. Selectable turnover tone controls, variable FM muting, two-position filters, even a special five-position tape monitor selector.

However, you don't have to pick one of Yamaha's most expensive receivers to get a full complement of functional features as well as our own exclusive Auto Touch tuning and ten-position variable loudness control.

The End of the Double Standard.

Just keep in mind that all Yamaha stereo receivers, from the most expensive to the least expensive, have the same high quality, the same low distortion, the same superlative tonality.

It's a demonstration of product integrity that no other manufacturer can make. And, an audio experience your local Yamaha dealer will be delighted to introduce you to.

To the Editor:

Perhaps now that the general feeling of disgruntlement that pervaded UVM's evening with Bob Dylan has subsided a bit, someone can clarify a few points raised in letters forwarded by Mr. Fisher and Mr. Ryan in the November 13 issue of the Cynic.

Regarding the allegation that Staige allowed his "innumerable" stage crew to occupy "vast quantities" of prime seating area before the show began; I feel that Mr. Fisher is gravely overstating the effect. As one member of that "innumerable" stage crew, I had planned to secure a seat in the prime viewing area only to return to the gym shortly before the doors were to have opened to find that my coat which had been resting on a chair in the third row had been removed by Staige. His explanation was that the doors had been opened before expected and that it was unfair of us to save seats by placing our coats on them. Thus, several of us lost seats in this manner. Imagine my surprise when I noted that approximately two rows were entirely occupied by "gentlemen of the press," record company representatives, members of Dylan's legions of PR people, road crew and documentary film crew, as well as a few friends who had been admitted early by Dylan's own security staff.

I cannot speak for anyone else, but since I was asked to work throughout the concert

Perhaps now that the general feeling of disgruntlement that pervaded UVM's evening with Bob Dylan has subsided a bit, someone can clarify a few points raised in letters forwarded by Mr. Fisher and Mr. Ryan in the November 13 issue of the Cynic.

Regarding the allegation that Staige allowed his "innumerable" stage crew to occupy "vast quantities" of prime seating area before the show began, I feel that Mr. Fisher is gravely overstating the effect. As one member of that "innumerable" stage crew, I had planned to secure a seat in the prime viewing area only to return to the gym shortly before the doors were to have opened to find that my coat which had been resting on a chair in the third row had been removed by Staige. His explanation was that the doors had been opened before expected and that it was unfair of us to save seats by placing our coats on them. Thus, several of us lost seats in this manner. Imagine my surprise when I noted that approximately two rows were entirely occupied by "gentlemen of the press," record company representatives, members of Dylan's legions of PR people, road crew and documentary film crew, as well as a few friends who had been admitted early by Dylan's own security staff.

I cannot speak for anyone else, but since I was asked to work throughout the concert as an aide to Dylan's own security team as well as during the set-up and take-down procedure as a stage hand, I conservatively estimate that I worked a total of 10 hours on the concert. All I received as payment was one "free" ticket valued at $8.50. To break this down in terms of a per hour rate, I made 85 cents per hour – and missed 75% of the concert. Other members of the crew did get to see the concert, but in my opinion, deserved to get a good seat since they worked very hard at a very low rate.

I would further suggest that Mr. Fisher substantiate his future allegations with something more than hearsay. For example, "a friend talked with a fellow," and, "I myself didn't attend the New Riders concert... but I understand," are not the most accurate reflections upon which one can make an assumption.

Finally, regarding Mr. Ryan's objection that Staige is serving the interests of himself and a "small elite group of friends," I can only say "Bullshit!" If that was true, I submit that this "small elite group" would not have to work their tails off to get a good seat. I further submit that Mr. Ryan has absolutely no idea how much work is involved in getting a concert ready. It really is an awesome task.

Amidst all the ripping off and low-down stealing that is attributed to the "evil students," I would personally like to thank two/anonymous returnees. Praise For Gary Jones

To the Editor:

As a student of the University of Vermont who is constantly being bombarded with pessimistic news, I feel it is time to offer some praise and thanks to a member of the University's staff. I am thinking specifically of Gary Jones, Assistant Manager of Wright Dining Hall. Gary is a diligent, honest individual who works many hours to help each student feel a little better about the SAGA food service. In dealing with students, he has always been willing to listen to their complaints and praises (although the latter is seldom offered) and work with these suggestions.

As a member of the Residence Hall staff, I have always been surprised and grateful for the assistance Gary has offered.

So the next time you are in Wright Dining Hall or have to make some arrangements with SAGA, contact Gary if you want some good advice and positive support.

Thanks Gary – you are making SAGA a little easier to swallow.

Sincerely,

Non-smoker's Rights

To the Editor:

I am one of the many claiming "non-smoker's" rights of whom A. C. Fischer is so disdainful.

Fischer's statement that he or she will smoke anywhere he or she pleases shows inconsideration and pig-headedness that appall me. To say that she or he will continue to smoke anywhere he or she pleases until we, the non-smokers, "demand that Kellogg's Cereals be outlawed," is completely inconsistent and illogical. Nobody forces me or Fischer to eat Kellogg's cereals or any other product of dubious value; to do so would be illegal.

The issue is not whether poor foods or cigarettes are outlawed but whether I shall be forced to suffer the immediate discomfort of foul air, the permanent respiratory damage from breathing smoke, and the annoyance of coming home with foul-smelling clothes and hair. I for one refuse, Fischer, and I demand that you put out your god-damned cigarette.

Concert Bureau Doesn't Lose

To the Editor:

In reference to Jim Fisher's letter titled "Davis No Exception," there are several striking points that come to my mind. Fisher has to be one of the most easily convinced people I have ever heard of. The facts with which he blasts Staige Davis come from sources such as "a friend talked to a fellow who claimed", and "I myself did not attend the New Rider's concert but I understand..." Jim Fisher levels some pretty heavy accusations on the basis of what others told him, pure heresay. If these people were so pissed off, where are their letters? I agree with you that the people who work at concerts (and many of them work damn hard) deserve at least a fair chance to get to see the show, but let's not sling mud on the basis of third hand rumors and stories about shows you did not attend.

As for Dave Ryan's letter, I was absolutely astounded that a person who is an editor of the Cynic could show such total disregard for the rules of logic, honesty, and common decency in presenting his opinion. What the hell does Ryan mean by his use of the word "blackmailing"? Blackmailing who? Lane Series? S.A.? The students? Basic English grammar requires that a verb like blackmailing have an object. Obviously Ryan's use of the word has no other object than a sensationalist smear. In case you haven't heard, Dave Ryan, despite Dylan, the New Riders did not lose money. The money made by S.A. from the Dylan concert is not going to be used to cover Davis' mistakes, it's going to be used to hold more and cheaper concerts so that writers like you can go to shows free and then libelize the people who work their asses off to put them on for you. One more thing, while the Lane Series was handling the concert, news leaked so badly that there were hundreds of people lined up long before tickets went on sale. This was entirely contrary to the promoter's theory of how the show was to be run. It was supposed to be secret until tickets were actually on sale so that everyone would have a fair chance of getting a ticket. Mr. Bell (the promoter) was threatening to cancel. It was because of Staige's last minute arranging of the larger space in the gym that the concert was assured. It may have gone on anyway, but only 2500 as opposed to 5400 would have had a chance to see it. It took a shitload of work to put that concert on in three days (the entire New Riders set up had to be taken down for a children's show on Saturday morning, and then re-assembled for Dylan.) I know 2900 people who owe Staige and S.A. Concerts their thanks, not criticism. This does not include the thousands of people who will benefit from future productions made possible by the hard work of these people.

Staige never promised he would resign from his position with the Concert Bureau if elected S.A. President. Ask the people who ran against him. He did offer to step down but was persuaded to stay by the rest of the Concert Bureau because they felt he would be a real asset despite the limited time he could devote to them and to the student body. Why don't you go up and ask him about some of the problems? Take Jim Fisher with you. Staige is always available to anyone who wants to talk about anything. In the meantime, I suggest that you and Jim Fisher rethink just who is on a power trip. Get the facts next time.

True Nature Of Ford

An Open Letter to the Student Body

With the 1976 Presidential election less than a year away, the liberal wing of the Democratic Party has shown no proclivity to rally around the candidacy of one of the nine declared candidates. This confusion and indecision has been reflected in the basic lack of strong student involvement in any one of the Presidential hopeful's campaigns. Unfortunately, if this trend is allowed to continue there is a strong possibility that the outcome of the 1976 election will be four more years of Gerald Ford as President. This is not idle speculation, all of the polls show that Ford at this time could defeat any of the announced Democratic candidates.

The problems inherent in a long term continuation of Ford's Presidency are too numerous to list; every day we are confronted with the implications of his conservative political philosophy... His veto-machine Presidency is geared towards increasing the domination of big business in the United States and limiting the progress and care of the needy individual. His assertions that he wants to limit federal spending do not seem to include his record defense expenditures or his subsidies of failing industries. Instead, his efforts have been directed at limitidg health care, environmental protection, welfare, civil liberties, education, and food for needy children and families. He seems oblivious to the needs of our nation's cities.

What can be done? Within the past month a "Ford on Trial" movement has been started at Oberlin College in Oberlin, Ohio. This organization is designed to educate the general public as to the true nature of Gerald Ford's Presidency through an extensive grass-roots campaign. Detailed research has been undertaken in five broad-issue areas: military and foreign policy, civil rights and liberties, economic policy, energy and the environment, and health-education and welfare. However, Oberlin is only one college in a semi-rural location. By ourselves we can only reach a limited number of people in our campaign. If the Ford on Trial movement is to be a success of measurable proportions, the formation of a substantial number of organizations similar to Oberlin's is a prerequisite. The door to door organizing that is the crucial activity in a movement of this nature can only be successful if large numbers of students are willing to get involved. If college students are to have a significant impact on the 1976 election their presence must be felt early. THE TIME TO ACT IS NOW!

Sincerely,
Michael Barr

Lane Series Explains

To the Editor:

Criticism can be a very good thing. It can be either constructive or destructive. We can learn and improve as a result of criticism, or be crushed by its power. Two weekends ago we saw an example of both types of criticism.

To set the scene, it was the weekend that will long be remembered. Friday night it was the Lane Series presenting Chick Corea in Return to Forever, and SA Concert Bureau presenting the New Riders of the Purple Sage. Saturday night was the big one, a joint operation between the Lane Series and SA Concert Bureau – The Rolling Thunder Revue, starring Bob Dylan and Joan Baez. And then there was the criticism. Let's talk about Friday night first.

The Lane Committee was very critical of the booking of the New Riders of the Purple Sage by SA Concert Bureau (please note, we were not critical of Staige Davis). We felt that with two Concert Bureaus on the same campus that there was no need to compete with concerts on the same night. The two series are designed to bring as much live entertainment to the University Community as possible – certainly not on the same night. They should complement each other, not compete with each other. Students had a right to be mad, a right to criticize, but no right to criticize Staige Davis for the happenings of the weekend in any way. Please understand, SA Concert Bureau, as well as the Lane Working Committee makes its decisions by Committee. No individual is, or should be made, accountable for the actions of a committee. If SA Concert Bureau makes a decision, the Concert Bureau makes that decision, not Staige Davis. In the same way, if the Lane Working Committee makes a decision, I, as chairman of the Lane Committee, am no more responsible for that decision than Staige would be for SA Concert Bureau. We must support the decisions of our committees but do not have to answer to them, nor should we be personally blamed for them. The committee speaks as one, and only the committee is to blame. In a way we were both responsible for the conflict that resulted. We have learned through constructive criticism, that in order to avoid these situations, we have to learn to cooperate with each other, that is, set up some form of communication. This is being worked on now, and I am confident that situations like on Friday November 7, will be avoided in the future.

Saturday night, at the Dylan Concert, was our first effort at working together on a concert. I am sure I can speak for the Lane Working Committee and say that it was a pleasure and a rewarding experience to work with SA Concert Bureau on this project. We can work together quite efficiently and I would like to see us work together more in the future.

In closing, I would like to commend Staige Davis and the SA Concert Bureau for their fine job in setting up the gym for the concert (they set up the stage, chairs, and everything else), and for their high degree of professional skill on the night of the concert. A job well done!

Sincerely,
Lloyd J. Goodrow,
Chairman

No Favors For Work Crews

To the Editor:

As a member of the SA Concert Bureau work crew, I feel that a response is necessary to Jim Fisher's letter which appeared in the Nov. 13 issue of the Cynic. Mr Fisher's accusations and allegations concerning the Dylan–Baez concert are based on misinformation and, it seems, some sort of a personal grudge. As for his statements that "the innumerable stage crew" – was guarding and occupying vast quantities of seating in the first 5 rows –.this is entirely false. No one on work crew was allowed to sit in the first 2 rows as those seats were saved for the people who had been standing in line outside. Furthermore, we were specifically instructed not to save seats for anyone not on work crew (which numbered approximately 30 people.)

The crew had been working straight since 11:30 a.m. setting up the stage and the seating (incidentally, this work was for no pay): it certainly seems that they deserve a chance at good seats. I, myself, did not get to my seat until 9:00 because I was still working at the door doing the guest list, where I found at least one of the Lane Series ushers to be very uncooperative concerning our request that he put the ticket stubs in their proper receptacle.

As far as Staige Davis' involvement in the show is concerned, I again feel that Mr. Fisher is being unjust. The handling of the concert was suddenly dumped in his lap 3 days before the show, and, taking this into consideration, he did an admirable job. He, personally, got to see almost none of the concert because he was continually busy throughout the evening. After the show we were told, a number of times, by the promoters and members of the tour that SA concerts work crew had done an excellent job throughout the show. In fact, we did the fastest "take-down" on the tour so far – much of th credit for this goes to Staige's excellent leadership and organizing abilities.

In the future I hope that Mr Fisher will more thoroughly substantiate himself and look beyond his petty grudges before making harmful accusations.

Thank You
Ginny A. Gold

Women's Sports Roundup

by Kimberly Honze

This past week found the women's swimming teams and the volleyball team on the road. Several of the varsity field hockey members were also travelling to Dartmouth College this past weekend for the Northeastern Field Hockey Tournament. Ten women on the UVM squad were chosen to represent the New England Field Hockey Association in the tourney, in which they compete against All-Star teams from additional northeastern field hockey associations.

On Friday, November 14th, while the greater portion of the student body was revelling in the snow, two UVM cross country runners were not admiring its beauty. National contenders Carol Degan and Jeanne Crane watched as the snow blanketed their hopes of reaching Ames, Iowa in time for the event.

The women's volleyball team was stopped on Thursday, November 13, by a strong Keene squad, 2-1. They had traveled to Castleton State College, where, in a second set, spectators watched as Castleton State upset UVM, 2-0. UVM hopes to even its record with Keene and better their record with Castleton State (1-1), when they meet again November 22 at Keene. Meanwhile they are concentrating on a match with Green Mountain, which will be played on home ground Thursday, November 20, at 6:00 p.m.

Both the women's A & B swim teams were disappointed on November 11, when the A team traveled to an invitational at Mt. Holyoke College, and the B team visited Smith College for a dual meet. Laura Schreitheim was the outstanding performer for the A team, placing first in the 50 yard breaststroke (349) and third in the 100 yard breaststroke (1:19:35). Andrea Kalinch did well in the butterfly events, capturing a third in both the 50 yard (31.3) and 100 yard (1:10:8). The B team performance was highlighted with an excellent showing by Kathy Durr in the freestyle events. The teams continue with their busy schedule when the B team travels to Plattsburgh the 18, and the A team to UMass the 22nd, for some tough competition.

This week finds the gymnastics team opening their season the 22nd, with an away dual meet against Green Mountain. An optimistic coach Szabo looks forward to a winning season.

NBA Establishes Review Board

New York – National Basketball Association Commissioner Lawrence F. O'Brien announced last week the establishment of an Officials' Review Board consisting of one general manager, one head coach, and John P. Nucatola, the NBA's Supervisor of Officials, as Chairman.

The Board will review all complaints and recommendations involving the officiating of NBA games. Each general manager or coach will file his complaint or recommendation with his representative on the Board. Chairman John Nucatola will develop all pertinent information in each instance, including game films and reports, and the Board will promptly review the matter by a meeting or through a conference call. The Board will then forward its findings to the Commissioner for his determination.

While critical remarks by club personnel will not be tolerated, the work of the officials will continue to be closely scrutinized, and Commissioner O'Brien feels the creation of this committee provides an appropriate vehicle for orderly consideration of complaints and recommendations affecting the conduct of NBA games.

THE SPORTS SCENE

by Norm Robinson

This weekend the University of Vermont skating Catamounts will begin the new season when they travel to St. Louis for games on Friday night and Sunday afternoon against the Bilikens.

The Bilikens are currently 5-5 on the season, with their latest wins over Providence by scores of 8-5 and 8-0 this past weekend. Their big gun is senior Mike Belanger who picked up 12 points against the Friars.

A tough, defensively minded club, St. Louis waits and makes their own breaks while they rely heavily on two of the country's premier goal tenders Lindsay Middlebrook and Brian O'Connell.

In preparation for St. Louis the Cats played McGill University last Sunday and came out the winners by a football score of 15-3.

The success of the Catamounts depends upon a lot of things. Perhaps the biggest is how well the freshmen compliment and enhance the nucleus built around the McNamara's, Glynne's, and O'Connell's.

When looking at the freshmen, defenseman Joe Oslin sticks out in particular. The 6' 1", 190 pounder is one of the biggest men on the team and when playing next to John Glynne, they form a tandem that looks to be a great pair.

He is strong and shoots very well, but perhaps one of his biggest assets is his ability to play a strong defensive game. Oslin knows the game very well and appears to be a strong point in future years.

Greg Wilke wears number four on his back and the native from Tewksbury, Mass. is solid to put it lightly. He packs 185 pounds into a six foot frame that makes him a tough defenseman.

Although Greg only played one period Sunday he showed signs of being another great find. Sought after by such schools as B.U. and Providence, Wilke will be a great asset to UVM hockey. He appeared a bit shaky on his first shift, but fit in well on the next few times out.

The third defenseman is Chuck Stahilin. The only New Yorker on the squad is another strong man. At 5-11 and 190 pounds he can clear out the crease with the best of them.

Stahilin is matched with Chuck Ross in what is a very defensively oriented pair.

Gordie MacFarlane hails from Aurora Ontario and plays wing for the line centered by Tom Colby. Ben Rocheleau is his wing-mate. MacFarlane is an excellent skater who played Junior A in Canada.

He releases his shot very quickly and looks good in front of the net.

If one didn't look at the program you would think Ben Lord is a junior or senior. The Massachusetts native fits right into the Cross style of play. An excellent passer he compliments linemates Andy Halford and Michael LeBeau very nicely.

The line has some speeders on it and Lord looks as though he will do the job expected of him.

Jim Duffy was not as highly publicized as some but the 5-11 175 pound wing may be the sleeper on the club. He plays the game much as Rogie Mallette did. A real worker, and he forechecks very well and is a general nuisance to the opposition.

The last, but hardly the least of the freshmen is big Ed Hill. The wing is a former teammate of Wilke at Tewsbury, Mass. He packs 183 pounds into a 6-2 frame and is just the man Vermont needs to go into the corners and dig the puck out.

Although not as fast or as quick as some of Vermont's forwards Hill is an extremely smart player and a very good passer. Once in the crease he'll be a tough man to move out.

Thus completes my humble and undoubtedly biased look at the hockey freshmen. They all have alot of talent, or they wouldn't be here, but one should not expect instant stars.

Very few freshmen have to cope with athletic competition as well as the scholastic and it's a tough transition.

If (and that's a big word), the freshmen can make the transition and if the regulars play the way they can, Vermont will have a very good season. It will be interesting to see how well the Cats do.

Good luck to all the freshmen as well as the returnees!

Field Hockey Tourney

Ten members of the UVM Women's field hockey team completed their season this past weekend by competing in the North East Field Hockey Tournament, held at Dartmouth College.

Representing UVM on the college "A" division First team were senior, Ann Margolis, and freshman, Lisa Fernandez. The All-Star teams from various schools in the north east, competed in the "A" and "B" classifications. On Saturday, the first team played two games, the first was against New Hampshire Association, which was won by New England Assoc. (of which UVM is a member), 1-0. In the second game, New England Association was stopped 1-0, by the first team of the college "B" division. They were handed another defeat on Sunday, when New Hampshire counterattacked, and won 3-1.

Represented on the second team for UVM were Sharon Farquharson, Karin Abrahanson, Bonnie Hunt, Barb Marticelli, and Fran Fried. In their three games they tied Rhode Island 0-0, Maine 1-1, and defeated Styvensant 3-1. In the final game against Styvensant, UVM link, Fran Fried was able to contribute a goal to the winning cause.

Other members of the UVM squad participating in the tournament were link Heide Pelkey; right inner, Ellen Cooke; and goalie, Pam Titus.

Coach Lange is already anticipating next fall's season. Looking forward to a fine crop of incoming freshmen, and only losing two senior members, Anne Margolis, and Maryanna Plante, she hopes for a fine season.

Ski Jumping Isn't For The Crazy

by Jeff Green

The sport of ski jumping is a victim of great misconceptions in the US today. Many people view jumpers as "crazies" who climb a steep scaffold, ski down it; sail through the air, and land...over and over again. This view is understandable, for the sport is relatively young in the US. Since the popular winter sports such as Hockey, basketball and Alpine skiing command their attention, people have not been exposed to ski jumping.

Jumping is a "Nordic" sport as is cross country skiing. Jumping originated in Scandinavia, where it is still one of the number one sports. The most prestigious meet of the year is at the Holmenkollen jump in Norway. At the event, a medium sized crowd averages 70,000 persons, an indication of its popularity.

The sport is centralized throughout Europe, with many good size jumps. The average jump used for international competition must be at least 70 or 90 meters. (This is the measurement of the hill size.)

As far as actual jumping is concerned, UVM jumper Treygve Raiseth says, "There are as many different styles as walking. People don't realize how complicated it is. The difference between a good jump and a bad jump can be made in a split second after the takeoff. Your timing must therefore be perfect (which is the hardest to master, since it all occurs in about 1/4 of a second.) You must push off when you reach the lip, extending yourself out towards the tip of your skiis." Roiseth continued to say that, "you have to try and minimize your physical limitations between speed and air. Your body must act as a foil, and you have to consider your head and hand positions plus air pressure to give a good flight curve – all part of a good jump."

The jump is composed of five parts. The actual jump structure of the "inrun" and the "lip" is the point of takeoff. Once in the air, there is about a 20 foot section which is relatively flat and leads to the steep part of the hill and is known as the "knoll". The landing takes place on the steep part of the hill, hopefully as far down as possible, not on the flat as some believe. If one lands on the flat, one's body cannot absorb the shock as well as it can on the hill. This makes a difference when one travels upwards to 45 miles per hour. Then there is the "outrun", which is flat (sometimes slightly uphill) and the place where the jumper slows to a stop.

The length of the jumping ski varies from 7 to 11 feet long (usually measured in centimeters). The base of the ski is similar to Alpine Skis, except that this nordic ski has four grooves instead of one. Wax is used to get maximum speed on the inrun, and the grooves provide stability. Unlike conventional bindings the jumper's heel is not held down, but is held in at the toe. This allows him to extend his body over his skis forming an air foil. The boots are similar to lightweight hiking boots, but have squared toes to fit into the binding.

Our UVM jumpers from Norway Treygve Raiseth, Roger Hodden and formerly Petter Konsigli have expressed disappointment in our collegiate circuit jumps. Says Raiseth, "Most jumps in Europe are at least 70 meters for competition, even at the collegiate level. The UVM jump is about 45 meters and I doubt if very many students even know where it is (Williston). These jumps are like our practice ones at home." Freshman Roger Holden shares the same sentiments, but both feel it is a great opportunity to be at UVM and the United States.

The UVM jumpers believe their training is going well, especially with the use of the one of a kind "artificial" jump built by Coach LaCasse and Petter Kongili (pictured). As of now, the jumping squad consists of Treygve Raiseth, Roger Holden, Joe Lamb, Tom Lantz and Dennis Lambert. So far, they are ahead of last year's physical tests and are all looking forward to the season with great optimism.

Pick-Up Tickets On Tuesday 25th

This is a reminder to all students and Faculty and Staff who have the season Athletic Coupon Books that the coupons in the book must be exchanged for game tickets on the day before the game. In the case of a Monday game or a game during a holiday, the exchange day will be the last class day before a game.

Event number 1 in the Athletic Book is a basketball game on Saturday, November 29th and event number 2 is a hockey game on Monday December 1st. The Thanksgiving recess is November 26th to 29th so the last class day is Tuesday November 25th. This will be the day to exchange coupons for game tickets for both events.

To make it convenient for as many people as possible, 3 Exchange stations will be set up – (1) in the lobby at Patrick Gym from 9:00 a.m. to 4 p.m. (2) at Billings Student Center from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. and (3) at the Faculty and Staff Dining Room on the 5th floor of Waterman, during the noon hour.

Please remember – the coupon in the Athletic Coupon Book will not admit you to the games.

We will keep reminding you of the Exchange Days for the various games by posting them in each week's edition of the Cynic.

Remember to pick up your tickets.

CAT NOTES

by Jeff Twiss

The golden year of 1975 is now but a rewarding memory as the dawn of another explosive year of UVM Hockey embarks upon all of us.

The golden year of '75? Ah yes, outgrowing our Division II hitches, the Catamounts challenged the mighty Division I league and with it such powerhouse schools as: Harvard, Cornell, B.U. and New Hampshire. Many people shunned and scoffed at the notion that this little, lonely Division II would even so much as create a scare in Division I. But, what was the biggest story of the year in Division I. A third place in the Division as well as an impressive third place in the championships at Boston Garden.

Now, who could possibly forget the Providence or the UNH games. In both games, many loyal UVM fans thought that their Cats had had it. Against Providence, down 5-2 with 12:00 minutes left in the final period, Timmie O'Connell, Randy Koch, and Andy Rickard banged home goals to knot the score at 5-5 and the Field House, amazingly, withstood the thunderous, triumphant yelling from the crowd. And, with this noise, Michael Lebeau and Chris Hurley politely eliminated the Friars from attaining a spot at the Boston Garden, by giving our Cats a sensational 7-5 victory.

The UNH game, at Durham, N.H. was about as nail-biting. Down 3-2 with a mere sixteen seconds to go, Randy Koch who just barely stepped on the ice after serving a two minute penalty for tripping was in front of the UNH goal with no UNH goalie. The puck had popped from out of the corner where UNH goalie Cap Ralder had hoped to stop it with his stick but the puck took a tricky bounce and a hustling Tim O'Connell lifted it to Koch who banged it home. Lucky? Hustle? Instinct? It's up to you, the Cats won 4-3 with Koch also netting the winner and all the UVM fans who couldn't be there live to see it, proceeded to destroy their rooms, TV's, roommates etc. with crazy happiness.

This year? Who knows, B.U., Harvard, Cornell, UNH, Providence, Brown, and Clarkson seem to be our toughies in Division I. But with the dynamic good looking freshmen class plus the vets and Coach of the Year (?) Cross, who knows, the other teams know we're in the Division now!

Alumni Game Sunday

Lokomotiva, one of the top basketball clubs in Yugoslavia, will bring its international-style basketball to Burlington, Vt. on November 23 for a game with the UVM varsity. The game, open to the public, is set to begin at 9 p.m., preceded by an alumni game at 7 p.m. Over 25 alumni players are expected back and the clubs will be divided into the odd and even years. Intramural director Norm Strassburg and athletic director Denis Lambert will handle the two alumni teams.

Some of the leading players returning to campus are Ralph D'Altilis ('65); Keith Jampolis ('55), who scored 1,034 points in his career which spanned four years; Frank Martiniuk ('70), UVM's all-time scoring leader with 1,323 points; Earl Steinman ('55), one of the top shooters in the mid-50's and Greg Ashford ('74), the captain of the 1973-74 squad. Some of the new additions to the alumni list include Roy Greenman ('70), captain of the 1969-70 squad; Karl Kieslich ('63), George Henderson ('48), Stan Fleischman ('53) and Harold Moore ('56). Tickets for the interesting doubleheader are now on sale at the Patrick Gym (Room 206). Prices are $2.50 for adults and $1.50 for students. Former coach, John C. "Fuzzy" Evans (mentor from 1940 to 1965), is the honorary chairman and WCAX-TV Sports Director Tony Adams is the master of ceremonies.

UVM Breezes Through McGill, 15-3

by Norm Robinson

The University of Vermont hockey team totally destroyed McGill University Sunday afternoon as they coasted to a 15-3 win at Gutterson Field House.

A near capacity crowd greeted the Catamounts with the traditional hand clapping and shouting of "Go Cats Go" and they had plenty to cheer about throughout the entire scrimmage.

Under normal circumstances a 15-3 win would be right up UVM's alley, but Coach Cross would have undoubtedly liked a closer game. Vermont, priming itself for St. Louis tomorrow night, came out skating and fired home six goals in the first period to put the game away early. Because of this the Catamounts didn't have to work as hard as Cross would have preferred.

The Cats wasted little time scoring when Andy Halford took a pass from Michael Lebeau from behind the net and hit the light just 1:36 into the game.

Vermont continued to shower McGill goaltender John Millette with pucks, and their constant forechecking kept their opponents bottled up for most of the period.

After Bill Reber gave the Cats a 2-0 lead during a scramble in front of the net, Bill McAlduff teamed with freshmen Ed Hill for a picture perfect goal. Hill got the puck from Linemate Bill Spence along the right boards and hit McAlduff with a perfect pass in the middle of the McGill zone and the big defensemen beat Millette for an easy goal.

Randy Koch got Vermont's first powerplay goal when Vince Zelazny was called for holding. Koch followed it up with his second goal of the game minutes later on a hard slapshot that beat the McGill net minder on the short side.

Tim O'Connell picked up the first of his two goals when he skated down the left side and using his wing as a decoy, beat Millette to his left.

Vermont led at the end of the first period by 6-0 score, but it could have been more except for several very fine saves by the McGill goaltender. The Cats' continual forechecking was the cause for much of McGill's first period troubles.

Freshman Jim Duffy was a real workhouse for Vermont and it paid off at the 2:58 mark of the second period. Bill Spence picked up a rebound off a John Glynne slapshot and hit Duffy who was set up perfectly in front of the McGill net and the wing slammed it home to make it 7-6.

McGill got on the scoreboard with a power play goal by Mark Chodos to make it 7-1 but goals by Ken Yeats, Lebeau and Ben Rocheleay gave Vermont a 10-1 lead.

The visitors got their only non-power play goal of the game at the 13:05 mark when Chodos took a shot that hit a UVM player and bounded to Jeff Taylor who beat a surprised McNamara.

Tom Colby and another freshman, Bordie MacFarlane gave the Cats a 12-2 lead before Dave Brandt got McGill's last goal.

Peter Reynolds came into the nets for the beginning of the third period and saw Vermont build its lead to 14-3 on goals by Ed Hill and Tim O'Connell.

Paul Donovan finished up for Vermont and compiled four saves. Hill got his second goal and Vermont's last when he got a pass from Tim Duffy from behind the cage and beat the new goalie, Al Smith, to the short side.

Ken Yeates and John Glynne sat out the last period, allowing freshmen Greg Wilke and sophomore Dana Hooper to get some ice time.

As the score indicated, UVM simply outclassed McGill in all phases of the game and their lines looked extremely strong. The Cats had a few defensive lapses that they wouldn't be able to make against St. Louis but they are further along than last year at this time.

Standouts for Vermont had to be Randy Koch, who looks right at home with O'Connell and Reber, along with freshmen Jim Duffy and Joe Oslin. Duffy is a real spark plug, while Oslin, a 6'1", 190 pounded defenseman compliments John Glynne very well.

The Cats looked very good against a poor team, and with a few adjustments, should fare well against the Bilikens.

Catamounts Yankee Conference Champs

The improbable came to pass on Saturday as the University of Connecticut and Rhode Island played to a 1-1 tie in the final Yankee Conference Soccer game of the season. The only way the University of Vermont could win the Yankee Conference title outright was for the two schools to tie, and they did just that. In the game at Storrs, Conn., the Rhode Island Rams took the lead, over UConn, on a first half goal by Mario Pereira. The lead couldn't be held however, and with 13 minutes left to play, Jim Evans beat Ram goaltender Bob Nulletto to tie the score!

The title is the seventh in 12 years for Vermont and its fourth outright title. The Catamounts last won the title in 1969 under Head Coach Harold Grieg. They also shared the title in 1971 when they compiled a 10-2 record under Don Soderberg. Other Yankee Conference titles in Catamount Soccer history were in 1966 and 1967 and co-championships in 1965 and 1968.

Gymnasts Beat Plattsburgh

This past weekend the UVM Men's Gymnastic Team competed against the Plattsburgh State and won with 137.33 against 126.28.

The meet, UVM's first Intercollegiate Competition this season, proved to be another strong performance on part of the gymnasts. Having successfully competed the previous weekend in the Vermont Open Gymnastic Meet, the UVM Gymnasts continued by defeating Plattsburgh in four of the six events. UVM scored consistently higher than the Plattsburgh team as was evidenced by winning the floor exercise, long horse vaulting high bar, and still rings events.

Strong support for the UVM team was given by specialists Mark Gandev and George Krammer in the side horse event and by Gary Reid in the still rings. In floor exercise and high bar, Marty McClean and Gary Warren, respectively, helped tremendously. Competing all-around for UVM were Fred Lee, Bill Ahern, and Bill Crevier, placing first, third and fourth respectively in the all-around competition.

UVM's strong performance was shown by taking first places in five of the six events. Firsts were taken by Gary Reid on rings and Gary Warren on high bar, while Fred Lee placed firsts in floor exercise, parallel bars, and long horse vaulting.

This meet concludes UVM Men's Intercollegiate Competition this semester. The men's Gymnastic Team's next scheduled meets will be home against Dartmouth and UNH in February.

Icecats At St. Louis

by Jeff Twiss

The UVM Hockey Catamounts open up their 1975-76 season at Missouri Arena against the Billikens of St. Louis University. Last year the Billikens, under Coach Bill Selmon, swept the Cats, 3-2 and 7-4.

So far this year, St. Louis is 5-5. They have beaten North Dakota (8-1), Wisconsin (3-1), Ohio State (4-0) and more recently clobbering Providence (8-6) and (8-0). They have been defeated by North Dakota (5-4), Minnesota twice (4-3) and (6-3), Ohio State (5-4) and Wisconsin (5-2).

Also, last year the Billikens compiled an impressive 26-13-1 record and were ranked 7th in the nation.

There will be two games against St. Louis this weekend. Friday night at 8:00 and Sunday afternoon at 2:00. Both games will be aired by WVMT (620 AM).

Cigarette Smoke Irritates Non-Smokers

"I have no need to learn what a dirty lung looks like. My father was doing cancer research long before Cronig was even thought of. I probably saw more dirty lungs than he had toys in his crib."

[illegible] packs a day and [illegible] and breast cancer at the age of thirty. It's obvious you've learned nothing from your father. "who was doing cancer research long before I was ever thought of." I had an uncle who was smoking long before you were thought of and he's dead now from cancer. You can smoke as much as you want. Just don't do it around me, because I will politely ask you to put out your cigarette. And only a very insecure or belligerant person will persist in an action that causes discomfort so visibly in another human being.

Law Protects Atomic Power Company

To the Editor

The Joint Committee on Atomic Energy has reported out its new Price-Anderson Act, H.R. 8631, to replace the expiring act. It protects power companies and prohibits the public to recovering on more than $560 million coverage from a nuclear power accident, though government studies have estimated the damage could be in the billions of dollars with deaths at 3,400 and contamination of an area the size of Pennsylvania. Of this limited $560 million available for damage, four fifths is paid by the government.

With so little to cover so much with priorities between claimants and classes of claims, with so much radiation injury slow to show, the bill-makers foresaw law suits and the bill instructs the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to suspend its program of licensing new plants and reactors until adequate provisions are made to deal with the claims from the accident. There is no indication that the Congress intends to do this.

Congress's callous and careless acts in exempting nuclear power companies from full liability responsibility for the worst accident and the worst radioactive releases and also the evacuation plans which though mandated by law would in almost every case never work.

Let's ask our representatives to stop H.R. 8631.

Students Explored The Concept Of Visibility

To the Editor

I would like to reply to Richard Crimmins' letter (Remove Marks!) in the last issue of the Cynic. Crimmins was not only misinformed but misrepresented me and my class. The marks that Crimmins refers to are part of an exercise in visibility which was not a mandatory assignment (no one was forced to participate) and it was not intended to give the students license to randomly grafitti Burlington. As an art instructor at the University I feel part of my job is to instruct students concerned with object image making in ways of perceiving and giving visibility to images. The issue of visibility is an important and necessary one, and even though there may have been some misinterpretation of the assignment and poor judgment in the placement of images, these students have begun to explore the concept of extending the visibility of their images beyond the conventional limits of classroom studio. Traditionally the artist has produced an image object and displayed it privately or in a gallery or museum, but this institutionalized visibility is at best limiting. Alternatives should exist to allow the artist to go beyond traditional boundaries and integrate the arts and art process into the community.

In a society saturated with television, billboards etc. we are continually bombarded with images competing to persuade the consumer. At what point do we question our values and the integrity of such imagery? Public spaces which are painted by random groups of individuals seldom generate much controversy. Yet an organized effort is open to attack. Almost every bathroom and dormitory on campus has been marked by countless anonymous individual. Likewise, the paint splattered cannonball in front of the Old Mill seems to be an accepted object to paint. It seems arbitrary that the images made by my students have been singled out to be offensive.

I feel my students' exercise in visibility was a successful one. The images they produced are visually effective, display an efficiency of design and through their placement visually define a space. I find beauty in the work because it represents an expanded visual consciousness and explores the possibilities of the relationship between space and image.

UVM Volunteers Help Out At Correctional Center

To the Editor

I am the coordinator of volunteer activities at the correctional facility in South Burlington. Currently there are many programs going on and quite a few students and teachers from UVM are involved in our programs. Below is a listing of UVM students and staff who are working here, including many who have come from the Office of Volunteer Programs at UVM or the UYA program there.

Jim Swift, a UYA, is working as a recreation coordinator and spends a full working week with us. He has six or seven volunteers that he supervises and who provide recreational activities for over a hundred people incarcerated here. Sally Breemer is doing her student teaching, the second half, in phys ed and recreation and is working with Jim. In education we have three UVM people who are doing a variety of things. Lauren Singer, a graduate student, is tutoring and coordinating the "Learning Center's" activities. Jean Schultz, wife of a history prof., is cataloging books and establishing a circulation system for our library. Nora York, an undergraduate student, is doing part of her student teaching with us.

Three graduate students in counseling are working here. Two, Marilyn Parker and Ben Birnbaum, are running a personal growth-motivation group once a week. Chrys Ankeney is helping with program development under the supervision of the assistant superintendent. Another personal growth group is co-led by two undergraduate women, Debbie Suran and Sue Freedman.

A professor in Communications and Theatre, Jennifer Cover, is conducting a weekly oral interpretation–dramatics class for our women residents. All three of our pottery instructors are from UVM. Tim McCosker, who runs the pottery shop in the Living and Learning Center, Roy Fava, a graduate student, Torie Scott, a part-time student. Marsha Andreola is teaching one art class a week at the center and will begin her student teaching here soon and then will be here five days a week.

All these people have generously donated many hours of their time to help us provide much needed activities at the correctional center for our residents. I think they deserve a word of thanks for all their efforts.

Students Victimized By UVM Bureaucracy

To the Editor

The UVM community is about to be plunged into a new fiasco of the same importance as the pedestrian tunnel, courtesy of the Student Association and the Board of Trustees. On December 6 the trustees will decide whether or not to increase the student's library and athletic fees, in order to finance additions to these facilities. The S.A., on the basis of a "general assembly" meeting attended by a handful of students, may decide to endorse the increased fees, if they are not too large.

What this means is that we students may, as a group approve of the additions or we may disapprove, but no one knows for sure because as usual the great number of students have been left out of the decision making process. Accordingly, less expensive alternatives to the additions and fee increases may go unconsidered. For instance, instead of increasing the size of the athletic facilities, has anyone considered doing away with the Phys Ed requirement?

users of these facilities, should make the final decision ourselves, especially since we will be financing the additions to a large extent.

Once again we students are about to be victimized by bureaucracy at UVM, that is, unless we take action to prevent it. I would like to suggest some possibilities for student action on these matters. One is the formal petition. While I personally am not convinced of the effectiveness of petition, it is a possibility which has been suggested. Another possibility is the boycott of fee payment for next semester's tuition bill. What is sure at this point is that pro or con many students will go unheard unless we make ourselves heard and listened to now. I would be happy to discuss the possibilities for UVM's future with anyone concerned. Let's not be shafted by the S.A. and the Board of Trustees like we were shafted by the Trustees and the State Legislature on the tunnel issue.

Is TM Worth The Money?

To the Editor

I would like to present the following in response to the article, "TM: An Awakening Experience" in the November 20 issue of the Cynic. I am writing this in hopes that the people who read that article and found their curiosity sparked did not go out immediately and get themselves "initiated" into TM.

As a disillusioned TMer myself, I think it is necessary to present the other side of the TM story. Please understand that I have nothing against meditation itself, which is, as the TM people say, "A simple, natural, innocent process." However, I do object to putting a title on it, surrounding it with a process of mystification called "initiation", and then adding a rather large price tag.

Anyone can meditate, as it is an easy thing to learn. There is no reason to pay such a large amount to learn the technique. There are many different kinds of meditation, all of which offer some benefit. I know I practice several. If you would like to learn meditation, there are ways to do it for free. Counseling and Testing offers a workshop every Wednesday at noon, and they can tell you where to go if you cannot fit the noon hour into your schedule. Meditation can be a very worthwhile experience, but there is no need to impoverish yourself while enriching your being.

Yours,
Debbie Suran

End Of The Semester Blues?

Markings Are Creative Exppressions

To the Editor

It is distressing to see a member of this University allow himself to be so carried away by his own misguided righteousness and flair for cutesy criticism that he wrongly harms the Public Image of other individuals. Mr. Crimmins is certainly allowed to disapprove of creative expression, but I wish he would keep his feet out of his mouth while doing it.

To set the record straight, please be aware that no one was "subjected" to anything, or forced to perform immoral acts of destruction as Mr. Crimmins' letter insinuates. The orange, green and black symbols are innocent art forms, not signs of the Devil that must be scratched off, rubbed out, blown up, wiped from the face of the earth forever. Simply put, students of this college decorated their campus with their trademarks – there is nothing more outrageous to it. They are now being removed, so, Mr. Crimmins, feel secure. The sanctity of the UVM campus is safe from its students once more.

Faculty Senate Has Policy On Exams

To the Editor

In order to avoid situations in which students are forced to miss some of the last classes of the semester, because they have to study for or take examinations in other courses which have been scheduled "early," i.e., before the beginning of the regular exam period, the Faculty Senate last spring adopted the following regulation, which is University policy.

"Semester examinations shall be given only during the regular examination period except by permission of the dean of the college on request of the chairman of the department. No examinations shall be given during the last week of the semester except lab exams given in courses with specific lab sections."

The Academic Affairs Committee wished to remind all students that they cannot be forced to take examinations during the last week of the semester which conflict with their responsibilities for other courses. The Committee asks students to help us enforce this university regulation by reporting contraventions to their academic deans to the student representatives on the Academic Affairs Committee (Randy Jansen at 656-4248, 234 L.L.B. or c/o Cynic Office, Dinah Hendon tel. 864-6616) or to the Chairman of the AAC, Prof. Schmokel (451 Waterman, ext. 3180).

A Professor Who Doesn't Give A's

To the Editor

I have just come from another class where the instructor has informed us that he does not give "A's". To him, an A is a perfect mark, and nobody is perfect. Therefore no matter how hard I have worked this semester, the best I can get is a "B". I think this is really unfair. I admire those who give "A's" only to those who have worked for them and not to every other student, but I feel if I have done the required work and have worked hard, I should at least be able to hope for an A. In not giving them, instructors tend to discourage those who usually work hard for them. What's the use of beating my brains out if the best mark I can hope to acquire is a "B"?

Sincerely,
June [illegible] '76

Craft Shop At L/L

There's a fantastic new happening at Living Learning. ARRAKIS is opening soon!

The UVM MADRIGAL CHOIR, directed by Dale F. Voelker, will be giving its first Christmas Concert, December 9, at 8:30 p.m., in the Music Building's new recital hall, located behind Southwick. Old and new, familiar and unfamiliar, carols will be sung.

Also to be performed will be the Cantata "Gottes Zeit ist die Allerbeste Zeit", BMV 106, by J.S. Bach with members of the UVM Baroque Ensemble, music faculty, and students. Admission is free, and the evening promises to be a delight.

The MADRIGAL CHOIR has been reorganized this fall by Mr. Voelker, after the model of the "Kantorien", or professional instrumental-vocal ensembles that existed in Renaissance and Baroque Europe. The 18-voice Choir will make a television appearance, and will be part of the celebration of the dedication of the new music building in February.

Travel-Study In Russia

BOSTON—Despite reports to the contrary, the Soviet Union is a real place.

Most visitors wonder whether it is or not, because they see only the stereotypical images presented by official guided tours. But this January, American students have an opportunity to break through the touristy gobbledegook and really experience Soviet life.

The Citizen Exchange Corps, a non-profit organization, is sponsoring a "Jan Plan" study-visit to Russia that will put students into person-to-person contact with their Soviet counterparts and possibly afford them academic credit.

"CEC cuts across the iron curtain culturally and educationally and brings people face-to-face regardless of politics. Since it's been doing this for 15 years, it's gained the confidence of both governments and can carry out some pretty flexible programs," Boston University Russian Language student Paul Dobbs said.

The January exchange group to Leningrad, Riga, Kiev, and Moscow includes discussion sessions with Soviets, lectures by Soviet and American faculty, and opportunities to visit a full range of Soviet institutions: homes, schools, factories, clinics, museums, art exhibits, and performances.

In choosing participants for its exchanges, CEC seeks people with imagination and a desire to communicate. Students who go to the USSR with CEC can apply to receive 3 to 8 credit hours from their own universities or through the CEC Field Institute. Some scholarships are available.

The January Program Exchange is scheduled to leave New York January 2 and return January 22. CEC is also sponsoring a Spring Break Exchange, March 5 to 13, and summer trips on the Volga River and to Central Asia.

Students and faculty interested in participating in an exchange should contact Paul Dobbs or Natasha Leland at the CEC New England Office, 145 Hanover Street, Boston, MA 02108, or telephone (617) 227-0475.

Traineeships In Mental Health

Graduating seniors, new graduates, and graduate students are invited to apply for the Full-year Pre-Professional Traineeships in Mental Health offered at The Devereux Foundation in suburban Philadelphia, a group of multi-disciplinary residential and day care treatment and rehabilitation centers. Devereux is approved by the APA for doctoral internships in both Clinical and Counseling Psychology and by the IACS as an Accredited Counseling Center. Its Earl D. Bond Branch has received JCAH accreditation as a Psychaitric Facility for Children and Adolescents.

Several 12-month "live-in" Traineeships are available at: CAREER HOUSE, a transitional, co-ed, residential treatment/therapeutic education facility for post-high school youth with learning and personal adjustment problems; also, at the Hedges Treatment Center for emotionally disturbed youth with severe personal adjustment problems.

Columbia Scholarships

Fellowships are awarded annually to graduates of Vermont colleges and universities or Vermont residents for advanced studies at Columbia University in the non-professional Graduate Faculties of Political Science, Philosophy and Pure Science in the Graduate School of Arts and Sciences; in the professional schools of Arts, Architecture, Business, Engineering, International Affairs, Journalism, Library Service and Physicians and Surgeons. The fellowship pays tuition and fees for a full time program and provides a full stipend. Recipients also receive the cost of transportation from their residence in Vermont to New York City and return.

For applications and further information, students should write to the Director of Admissions of the Columbia division of their interest. The application deadline is January 6, 1976.

Poets Wanted

The American Poetry Press is now accepting submissions for its edition of the Anthology of New American Poetry. It is seeking poems by new writers which have an emphasis on regionalism in theme or subject matter. The goal of this periodical is to present a cross-sectioned picture of the grass roots poetry that exists throughout this nation. There is no charge for publication.

Some suggestions that might be helpful to those submitting poetry: 1) if possible, please type your poetry. 2) we cannot accept any allegedly obscene poems; 3) no anonymous poems will be considered; and 4) as in most publications, a short poem has a much better chance at getting in this journal than a long (more than 20 lines) poem. Also, poets must enclose S.A.S.E. if a reply is desired.

Poems may be sent to John Nichols – Managing Editor, American Poetry Press, 1001 West Main Street, Millville, New Jersey, 08332.

The Exchange

Counseling and Testing

We notice a new seriousness on campus and a settling down now that the Thanksgiving holiday is past. This is the last big push before Xmas vacation with the reality of exams facing us. Students are coming into Counseling and Testing in numbers; we are delighted to see you and like to think we are of real help. One subject keeps cropping up more this semester. This is a sense of isolation and apartness many students feel at UVM. Loneliness – 'other students are not very friendly. I find it difficult to approach them. I go to class week after week and rarely talk to anyone.' Strange that we can be surrounded by so many people and still feel alone. At the Counseling Center we talk a lot about 'owning ones power.' Faced with a situation, what are our choices and what can we do about it? Others do not seem friendly. Are you going to let yourself feel diminshed by the way they act? O.K. the problem is yours and you 'own it.' How about approaching someone else in class with a friendly hello? Is the fear of rejection so great your day will be ruined if they don't answer or just grunt (unlikely.) Can you handle it if you find they are feeling much the same as you are – a bit lost, a bit uneasy, and are delighted with the contact? My fantasy is to walk across campus some brisk morning and find everyone greeting everyone else. Wow, think of the instant sense of community one could engender! And what might happen from there? Potent stuff! Try it.

We have a reply from a graduate student who is having difficulty getting hold of periodicals through the interlibrary loan system and having the wrong one arrive after weeks of waiting. 'Why not have an on-campus journal, revised once a semester or year listing faculty members and grad students, and particular journals they would be willing to let other faculty members xerox. They might not want to let the more obscure journals out of their sight, but possibly they might.' This idea certainly has merit; try working on it through your immediate department and see if it doesn't take hold. I'm sure we would cooperate over here at Counseling and Testing. Keep the replies coming; drop in the boxes on campus in Billings, Jeanne Mance, L&L, Simpson or Patterson or call X2068.

Faculty/Student Dinner

"Guess Who's Coming to Dinner" plans are now under way for the third year, under the leadership of Mrs. Gail Feitelberg of the Women of UVM.

"Guess Who's", as it is getting to be known, is a program by which faculty and staff get together with students for dinner. It's something like computer dating—the Women of UVM and IRA, the Inter-Residence Association, enlist those interested in participating and then match up faculty-staff hosts with their student guests.

The date for the dinner is February 8, 1976. The deadline to sign up is noon of December 8, 1975.

Faculty and staff will receive a coupon in their November pay envelopes – but if yours was missing, take advantage of filling out the one here and drop it off or mail it to: Student Activities Office, Billings Center.

Students who have not found the flyers and coupons in their residence halls or at locations such as the Store and Billings, may also fill out the coupon and get it to the Student Activities Office by December 8.

Then, wait and see who comes to dinner (if you're a faculty/staff member), or wait and see where you're invited to dinner (if you're a student)

It's not only an exciting adventure to meet someone new, it's a way of getting a different perspective on the University we are all a part of.

Cynic Solves Financial Crises

Utilizing our brainpower—to the utmost (beyond what even we believed possible), the Cynic has come up with a few options to solve UVM's financial crisis. We feel the administration has not fully considered some of the possibilities that we are presenting, so we as dedicated students, will kindly share our knowledge with the university community. The suggestions below are for you to read, discuss or to use as kitty-litter. These are not just off the top of our heads, but were carefully thought out (with a little help from a few beers and pipefuls of hash to clear our heads.) Without further adieu, we now present the Cynic's ten money-raising ideas.

1. Put the faculty on a 40 hour week instead of the current 15-20 hour week they now enjoy. In conjunction with this, the Cynic will run a new contest: "Can you recognize your professor?"

2. Melt down all the metal being used in the tunnel, construct a large gun, point it toward New Hampshire, and say "Stick 'em up!"

3. Tax any student owning a Porsche or Mercedes Benz $100.00

4. Drape Waterman in American Flags, so that UVM can qualify for Bicentennial funds. (Special feature will be a reading of the Declaration of Independence by a history professor, but who would listen?)

5. With a little practice, the Administration could convert itself into a comedy act, and go on a national tour.

6. Declare war on the United State and lose. With the massive reconstruction aid we would receive, we could enjoy an economic boom like Japan and Germany.

7. Publish a book about UVM's woes, entitled, You Too Can Go Bankrupt. Asking price $12.95.

8. Charge admission to the tunnel as "UVM's very own example of a fiasco," and as a special treat, a tour of the jughandle, UVM's previous award winner of "The most wasteful project in a long time."

9. Sell the new Course Listing to Sominex as an inducement. Only $120.00 per credit hour.

10. Finally, stage a sit-in on Governor Salmon's office by all students truly concerned about education at UVM and request a Volkswagen bug for transportation.

We must humbly admit that we are not the only financial experts on campus. There are many of you out there who are as qualified as we are. Why don't you submit your ideas and suggestions to a person who can deal with them. Address them to Mr. Bozo de Clown, c/o Cynic Office, Billings Center.

Looking For Louise Part VIII
On A Cold Windy Day

by Gregory Katz

The third set let out at exactly 3:30 in the morning. They turned on the chandeliers for the last time, and Archie and Seargeant Bilko disappeared. Reed was slumped over the table, snoring, his tie dangling in a mug that contained a mixture of beer, cognac and ashes. Jeddy's eyes were glazed, and he hadn't said a word since the first set. Me, Eddy and Poot were awake though. I had let every sax line in, I became a hippo with Seargeant Bilko. We woke Reed and stumbled out onto the street. Where were we?

There is a very strange establishment in Montreal. It is open all night, and has pool tables and pinball and food. Only hoodlums go there, just young hoodlums. The older ones are in bars, but this place is where the kids go when they don't go home. We went in for coffee for the long drive home. I felt strange when I walked in, sort of old. I was reminded of an all-night bowling alley in Pittsburgh. Eddy and I had stopped there at sunrise one morning, and I challenged this kid to a game for five bucks. He rolled 7 strikes in a row. I think he lived in that bowling alley.

The coffee was good, but it sort of hurt. By conservative estimates there were 18 beers in my stomach, plus the cognac. The last solid food was my steamed bagel in Burlington.

Somehow we found the car. I sat up front with Poot, and the others slumped in the back. The streets were quiet, and when Poot turned on the car I had a feeling that we were being amplified across the entire city, in fact I thought there were cameras projecting us on a huge screen above Rue St. Catherine. The city was easy to get out of, and we glided over the Champlain bridge and headed east. The guys in the back were asleep, and me and Poot had time to talk.

"Poot, well it seems to long you know, like there's all this time and we have to go dancing and fill the sky. Louise will love me when I dance you know, it will be instantaneous. The magic is there all the time."

"That fucking albino is really bugging me Greg."

"Whaat?"

"That albino. At the place. He sat there leering at Archie with a big white beard. Before the last set he came up to me and asked for reefer. He said it was 1955 and that we were finally there."

"Where?"

"How do I know? But he had very pink eyes."

"Forget it Poot."

"Yeah I guess so. Who is this Louise you're talking about?"

"I don't know. But she loves me. She is in love with my spirit."

"I see."

"Do you remember that night in Fairfield? When we danced with Cathy and Betsy for the whole night. When it ended, we went naked in the Atlantic. That was the first time the spirit came to me. But Betsy didn't love me, that's ok., but I know Louise will. Only the spirit matters."

"Betsy loved you that night. She wanted to take acid with you."

"We kissed on the beach. The sun came up. That always happens. I'm talking about essence."

"Things always happened on the beach after we tripped. There were those old people having cocktails at 6:00 a.m. They had olives in their martinis and everything. Was that the night my Dad came down to the beach to check on us?"

"Yeah. That was cause when he came home I was sitting under your dining room table staring at the grain in the wood. And you asked him for $100 so I could go to New Mexico the next day."

"Yeah, and you never went."

"Of course not. I never go."

"What was happening then? I forget."

"That was when the police stole my Dodge with everything I owned in it. They towed it off 91 in Brattleboro and denied ever seeing it. I thought it had been stolen, so I decided to leave the east and hitch to Santa Fe. Then when we took acid I got locked into the beach and didn't want to face the asphalt hitchhike. So I didn't go. Then the cops admitted they had my car. I hitched to Bratt, but the axle was broken. I got a new axle and drove up north. I don't know what happened after that."

"My Dad wanted to know if you were all right."

"Was I?"

"Yeah, I guess so. He asked if you had taken anything."

"What did you say?"

"I told him you had smoked a lot of hash. Somehow that seemed better than saying you were tripping."

"Why didn't you ask him to go fishing with us?"

"We weren't fishing."

That seemed to end our conversation for a while. I sat back my seat and listened to Canada whirr by. We were nearing St. Jean, which is where we turn to cut south. At least that's what I thought. Poot didn't think so. He kept right on going, going over some drawbridge that I didn't remember.

"Poot, I think you should have turned there. Isn't that where we came out on the highway?"

"I don't think so."

We kept going for awhile. Sure enough we got lost. Don't ask me how, it's happened to more intelligent people than me. Finally Poot pulled off at a random exit, and we found a truck stop that was open. Jeddy and Reed woke up when we stopped the car. It was 4:30 a.m. We went in and ordered coffee. I asked the waitress very politely, "D'ou est l'Etats-Unis?" That's "Where is the United States?" in French.

She pointed out the window. That a way.

Thanks a lot.

Jeddy actually got it together to find a trucker who spoke English. He got directions from him. Seems I was right, and that we had to go back on the highway, over the bridge, and then turn south.

Jeddy insisted on driving, since he knew the way. Poot was reluctant to let him. At his best Jeddy is not known for having a firm grip on physical reality. But he insisted, so Poot let him. Poot made me sit in back, so he could be next to Jeddy in case of emergency.

We were parked at an angle right in front of the diner. Jeddy, who had never driven the Plymouth before, slipped the Powerglide into drive, and all of a sudden we lurched toward the big plate glass window that was the front of the diner. Poot screamed and tried to jam on the handbrake. But first we hit a ledge, a cement breaker about a foot high. That slowed us enough for Poot to hit the footbrake. Our front fender was half a foot from the glass. The waitress inside was standing there, frozen, with two coffees and some hotcakes on a tray.

Poot slipped the Powerglide into Park, and replaced Jeddy at the wheel. Jeddy didn't say a word about his demotion.

I closed my eyes in the backseat. Soon, I thought, we must go home.

The next time I looked up the sun was rising. We were heading in the right direction, getting near customs. Poot was only going about 40, because the engine was making extremely ominous noises. Jeddy was wide awake in the front seat, his eyes dangerously out of phase with the rest of the world.

The man at the border was surprisingly gentle. He waved us right through. We were back in America. The sun lit up the plains with a brightness that didn't sit well with my gut. I closed my eyes again.

All of a sudden, while I was half-sleeping, I saw snow floating by. Wait a minute. It's only October. It can't be snowing.

I opened my eyes. Feathers were flying all over the car. Little white feathers. They were getting caught in my hair and flying up my nose. I did not understand. Then my eyes focused on Jeddy. He was calmly ripping up a pillow that had been on the floor of the Plymouth. He was reaching in, slowly pulling out the stuffing, and then letting the breeze from his vent window scatter it all over the car. He was cackling sort of, not really loud enough to hear. Reed and Eddy slept through it all.

Jeddy kept at it. There were really A LOT of feathers flying. Poot finally started screaming at him. Jeddy didn't hear. He was ripping into that pillow all right. I was getting some of them down my throat and choking a little. The car looked like part of a slaughterhouse.

"Jeddy, umm, listen, I know it's been a long night, and it's morning now, but Brenda's waiting for you, the little woman and all that, and if you don't leave that pillow alone I'm gonna have to kill you."

He reached over and sort of ripped apart one section. 4000 feathers flew at my face from close range. I fought through them and grabbed the pillow. Jeddy held on to it tightly.

I pulled at it. Hard. The fucking thing came apart right in my hands. You have no idea just how many feathers are in a pillow until you rip one open.

"Hey! I can't see dammit." Poot was yelling, waving one arm in front of his face trying to clear out a space to see through. The car was like one of those little diddly things you get at Christmas, where you shake it up and "snow" falls over the Lincoln Memorial or something. We were a capsule of snow, cruising at forty with all these goddam feathers floating.

Jeddy was reaching back, trying to get the pillow Eddy was sleeping on. I grabbed the pillow before he could reach it. Eddy's head went Thunk against the doorhandle when I yanked out the pillow.

"Hey, gimme my pillow back. Ugh, it's snowing. Where am I?"

"Go to sleep Eddy. Jeddy turned into a dinosaur again. I must subdue him if we are to ever get home."

As quickly as it started, it stopped. Jeddy gave up and picked up his comic book. We got some of the feathers out by cross-ventilation, but they remained stuck in my nose and in my hair. And they clung to Eddy's beard, making him look like a hip Father Time. Poot just laughed and kept driving.

St. Albans... Milton... Winooski... Burlington!

We parked in front of Jeddy's. It was 6:30. Just 24 hours since Chinooski bailed me out. I looked at Poot and smiled. He was too tired to go to Hinesburg, so we all went into Jeddy's. I was glad I didn't have to be alone with him.

Jeddy had one mattress. Brenda was sleeping there calmly, innocently. It wasn't her fault we had gone to Montreal.

I didn't join the crowd on the mattress. Somehow I wasn't tired anymore. I was in some strange place where I was so restless from riding that I just wanted to walk around. I was too tired to sleep, and too drunk to sit still.

I went for a walk down by the park. Those damn gulls were flying around the lake. There was a chill in the air. October. Vermont.

The sun was too bright, and it made me feel kind of woozy. I thought about the last few days. Jail, tankers, Montreal, Archie, Poot. Talking about the acid and Betsy really took me back through time. I remember how loose life felt then. Not that acid made you loose, or anything like that. But my whole outlook had more room in it. Things weren't so closed in. Of course I was living with my parents and they were paying the doctor bills. Since then a lot of things had happened, but the

Closing The College Frontier

(CPS) – Like the western frontier, education has long been the key to a new life in America, allowing children to escape the social and financial status of their parents. But that golden age has come to an end, according to a report by two Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) analysts.

College graduates are no longer getting the kinds of management jobs they thought they were training for because of an economy that has absorbed all the management personnel it has room for. The market is glutted, forcing grads into lower status jobs. And the differences between the pay a college grad and a high school graduate pull in is diminishing every year, according to the study published in Change magazine.

The social implications are serious, the analysts say. Americans could begin to feel trapped in the social class they were born into. The escape valve that education provided could be closed to more people, and social class lines could become more sharply drawn.

Many people may end up receiving less education than their parents for the first time in American history. And another first may be that instead of children finding a higher social niche than their parents, they may end up with lower status jobs.

The problem, according to Harvard Associate Professor Richard Freeman and MIT Professor J. Herbert Hollomon, is that while the number of college graduates has increased, professional and management jobs haven't increased at the same pace. The ratio of college-level jobs to the total number of graduates dropped by about 3% between 1969 and 1974.

The result is that fewer and fewer graduates are finding desirable work. For instance, about one out of every three male members of the class of 1972 held nonprofessional, nonmanagerial jobs in the early 70's. Their counterparts in the class of 1958 had better luck, with only one out of ten taking nonprofessional or nonmanagement jobs.

But finding desirable work probably seems a small problem to the growing number of graduates unable to find work at all. Nine times as many 1972 grads were employed compared to 1958 graduates. Even high school graduates had a slightly better chance of being employed during 1972. Holloman and Freeman conclude that in the years between 1958 and 1974, the "college job market has gone from a major boom to a major bust."

The analysts predict that students intending to wait out the job drought by staying in college may have a long wait ahead of them. Their study states that these recent market developments for college graduates "represent a major break from the past and are not simply cyclical or temporary phenomena."

They point out that the money allocated to two typically high employers of college grads – research and development and education – has dropped substantially since 1964. In the meantime, more graduates have been turned out by American colleges and universities, creating a market flood that Freeman and Hollomon estimate will last until at least 1980.

The study concludes that as a result of less social mobility and job opportunity for college graduates, a re-evaluation of the American education system will be required. Changes in attitudes toward education will be necessary "as young people realize that education is less likely to provide the secure and simple path to status and affluence that it once virtually assured."

The Cynic welcomes and encourages articles, columns, and letters from all interested students, faculty, and members of the community. Looking For Louise ...

world definitely seemed more complicated. And here I was in Vermont, in trouble with the law again, out of a job, with just my buddies to see me through. And Ingrid. God, somewhere between here and Montreal she sure had come into my mind. Poot understood about her, but he seemed disappointed that I had acted so intensely.

Well, she was out of the picture. I hadn't even seen her since the night I left, which was unusual for a little town like this. For all I know, she could be at her parents in New Jersey. Or married to a pump-jockey in North Carolina. But it had only been a month since I had seen her.

I left the park after a while, and bought a paper at the diner near Jeddy's. Sure enough, I was listed in the police reports. Just small type though. "Gregory Katz, 22, was charged with industrial espionage early Monday morning, and was released on bail. His trial will be on October 30. Mr. Katz apparently went berserk and attempted to ram an oil tanker near the Mobil Facility at Cliffside Park."

Berserk, huh?

Well that gave me 4 weeks till my trial. I had to come up with a strategy. In the meantime I figured I needed work again. I figured I would get a job, save every penny, get acquitted, and leave Vermont by November 1. That way I had a good chance of beating The Big Snow.

I didn't know where I wanted to go, but that's always secondary. Deciding to leave was enough. I couldn't handle Jeddyboy anymore. The Big Snow would wipe out my diminished spiritual reserves. And I wanted to go somewhere new, or at least different, where the world could open up again. My life here was closed in, like looking through a shutter of a camera and watching it click.

The waitress brought me some coffee as I looked through the "Help Wanted" sections. I won't bore you with it again, it was the same as always. So I flipped to the Stock section, and then to the Sports. The sports headline read, "Series to open in Boston on Saturday."

The Series.

I had completely forgotten about it. Shows what pizza will do for you.

Maybe NBC was trying to contact me this very instant. With a contract to broadcast the Series!

Then again maybe not.

I read the article. It was bullshit. A bunch of statistics, the probable starting lineup, and Jimmy the Greek's predictions. The article gave me no feel for the event, no glimpse into the psychic makeup of the two teams. It was cut and dried, like some political writeup, or a news release from Ronald Ziegler.

All of a sudden I had an idea. I looked at the diner clock. It was a little past eight. Were newspapers open at eight in the morning? I decided to give it a try.

I dropped a dime in the phone at the end of the counter. A voice answered, "Hello. Burlington Free Press."

"Hello. This is Gregory Katz calling. Is the Sports Editor there?"

"One moment please. I'll check."

I waited for about a minute. Then a male voice, sounding extremely tired, came on.

"Merald here."

"Hello. Mr. Merald? My name is Gregory Katz. I'm willing to offer you a daily column on each World Series game. All I need is $50.00 per column."

"You ever written before?"

"Nope, that's the good part. I'm new, fresh. A new angle."

"Listen kid. We get Dick Young's column from New York for a hundred a day. We get Koppett from the New York Times. Pros. What do I want with some amateur?"

"Listen, Mr. Merald. I'm 22, I play ball myself. I almost went pro. I know the game inside and out. Those guys, they're just a bunch of old farts. Dick Young is just like Walter Cronkite. He's a robot, a machine. He doesn't know anything about what it feels like. Listen, Freddy Lynn is 24, right. I know how he feels standing out there in centerfield, getting loose in between pitches, then tightening up, straining in to catch the sign. I know the tension. All Dick Young knows is backstage stuff, who said what, what manager is gonna be fired, what secondstring player wants to be traded. I can take your readers THERE, right inside the game."

"Great kid, great. Why don't you try the student newspaper up at the University? They might go for that. All I print is sports news, not some kind of be-here-now stuff about how it feels to be inside of Freddy Lynn's jock strap."

"Mr. Merald, I think you're making a big mistake."

"So long Katz." He was gone. The funny thing was I had convinced myself that I could write a great column. Probably if he had believed me I would have had typewriter constipation and ended up quoting Dick Young. I'll never know.

Well I was still unemployed. I was tempted to call Hank and ask him for my job back. But that could wait. The coffee did wonders for my bowels. I went to Jeddy's for the toilet.

At Jeddy's everyone was crowded on the mattress asleep, except for Brenda. She was meditating on a carpet in the corner. I was learning to like Brenda. She had the good taste never to talk to me, and I heard from Jeddy that she could beat Buddha at checkers hands down. It was funny, I had been crashing there on and off for a month, and she had never once spoken to me. I was tempted to warn her that Jeddyboy had lapsed into his dinosaur stage, but I figured she would find out soon enough.

I crapped. So what else is new? Drink coffee, crap, sleep, eat, drive to Montreal, get busted, eat feathers, fall in love, take acid, find myself talking to lightbulbs, calling NBC on the phone, demanding open airwaves. Who were these old farts who controlled this country's media anyway. I am better looking than Curt Gowdy, and smarter too! They should put Chinooski on TV, let him educate the masses.

VPIRG Column
The Small Claims Court

by Peter Cobb

WHAT IS THE SMALL CLAIMS COURT

The Small Claims Court is court for people who feel that they have been gyped by a business. Unlike any other court one does not need a lawyer in the small claims court. The rules of the court are so simple and informal that they are easily understood by a non-lawyer.

In the small claims court, the consumer argues his or her case in their own words. There is no need for legal technicalities. The judge lets the consumer and the defendant give evidence. The judge acts as an impartial observer. He is concerned with allowing both sides to have their say and with getting the facts so that he understands the case.

WHO MAY USE THE SMALL CLAIMS COURT

Anyone over 18 with a genuine and reasonable complaint may sue in the court. Claims must be for money and not for return of goods and services. In Vermont, ones claim cannot be for more than $250. Over that amount the consumer must sue in the regular District Court, where one needs a lawyer.

WHERE TO SUE?

Small claims courts are part of the District Courts. The consumer must sue either in the county where he or she lives or the county in which the defendant lives.

SOME FACTS ABOUT THE COURT

By filing a suit in the small claims court, the consumer automatically gives up the right to a trial by jury. The defendant, however, may ask for a jury trial.

It may get complicated if one tries to sue a business not located in their area, unless it has branch offices or representatives in the county. For example, a consumer will have to sue a local agent of a national moving van line rather than the national office which may be located out-of-state. With a business whose national office is not in Vermont, the consumer might have to contact the office of the Secretary of State in Montpelier to find out whether the firm is registered to do business in Vermont and if so, where to send the summons if you sue.

WHAT TO DO IN SMALL CLAIMS COURT?

The first thing to do if interested in using the court is to write to VPIRG at 26 State Street in Montpelier and ask us for our guide to Small Claims Court. The guide will tell you exactly what you need to do in order to go to the people's court.

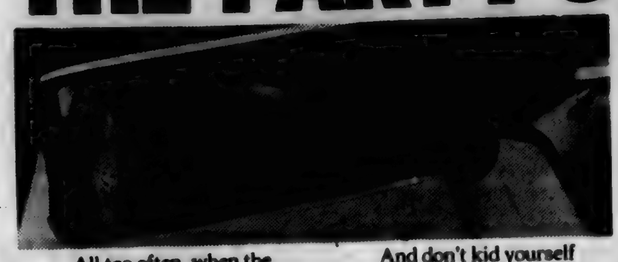
THE PARTY'S OVER.



All too often, when the party ends, the trouble begins.

People who shouldn't be doing anything more active than going to sleep are driving a car. Speeding and weaving their way to death.

Before any of your friends drive home from your party, make sure they aren't drunk.

Don't be fooled because they drank only beer or wine. Beer and wine can be just as intoxicating as mixed drinks.

And don't kid yourself because they may have had some black coffee. Black coffee can't sober them up well enough to drive.

If someone gets too drunk to drive, drive him yourself. Or call a cab. Or offer to let him sleep over.

Maybe your friend won't be feeling so good on the morning after, but you're going to feel terrific.

Pride and Prejudice Creaks

Brooke Gladstone as Charlotte and Nadine Maleski as Elizabeth

by Jonathan Lief

UVM's recent presentation of Pride and Prejudice (November 19-22) was a solid if unimaginative production of a ponderous play. Director Nancy Haynes must have chosen this dramatization of the Jane Austen novel for its abundance of leading female roles, though why, so soon after Lysistrata, this was necessary I don't know, unless there just aren't enough actors around to make up a well-balanced cast. Perhaps Prof. Haynes, who also wrote the adaptation, thought the play had some sort of timely feminist message to deliver, but if this was so, it never dug its way out from under the sheer weight of plot and sentence structure.

The very nature of the play is itself a fundamental obstacle to production: it is an adaptation of a very talkative 19th century novel, but staged in 1975. Technically, I suppose it's just right for theater, but without the leisure of the novel the play seems like compressed melodrama attempting to be elegantly amusing. It succeeds only when an actor manages to punch through the lofty words to their earthier meaning, something like trying to get a breath of cigarette smoke in an oxygen tent.

Pride and Prejudice is really not much more than the story of a family of English country gentle-folk, the Bennetts, struggling to marry off their daughters without causing too much scandal along the way. I suppose there is humor inherent here, but the language stifles most of it, aided by characters' collective incredibility.

As a period piece alone, the play offers a certain style of speech, but this needs to be brought to life with a touch of self-parody and a lot more pace. It lasted almost three hours on Thursday night, and throughout I waited for the production to stop taking itself so seriously. There are roles that obviously required exaggeration, which was provided, but the direction should have dealt more subtly with the leads, especially Elizabeth and Jane, the oldest daughters. Their wry morality and wisdom is the cornerstone of the play, and somehow this should have been lightened. Presented straight, they became predictable. The play is only nominally relevant today, and a little irreverance for the vehicle would have been refreshing. I would very much like to see a Monty Python version of this play.

These faults were in general a result of the direction, I think, not the acting. Karen Trott as Jane and Paul Ugalde as Reverand Collins were outstanding; their accents, for one thing, were naturally appropriate, while some others sounded forced. Nadine Maleski as Lizzie and Peter Kurth as her beau, Darcy, were also very good, but they both tended to underact, at times swallowing significant lines. As Mrs. Bennett, Susan Selig was effective in a role that made me feel uncomfortable all evening, and Vincent Rossano was a lot of fun as her husband, the Robert Young of the 1829's. Sara O'Neill stood out as the flighty Lydia, whose elopement caused so much panic in the household.

The set and scenery were beautifully designed by William Schenk, and they set an appropriately delicate tone for this production. The costumes, coordinated by Lisa Devlin, were not only pretty and (I guess) accurate, but there were so many, so frequently changed that they helped maintain interest when the dialogue dragged. With stage management by John Patton and lighting by Lisa Devlin and Jana Mack, the play was visually pleasing and tasteful.

What all this boils down to is that the people involved in this production did a very workmanlike job with a as creaky a play as it's possible to see these days. At least recently, UVM Theater has avoided doing anything that demands real complexity in its acting or conception; why, instead of something as truly meaningless as Pride and Prejudice, can't we see some serious, modern drama?

Space Odyssey Looks at Preservation Jazz:

Geritol Spiked with LSD

by Paul Prior

Don't you just love Thanksgiving? Pigging out for five or six days non-stop, shooting the breeze and breaching the peace, then you return to wonderful B-Town and work like mad to catch up on what you didn't do... Well, that's what writing this column tonight is similar to. I attended the Preservation Hall Jazz Band Concert, aboout a week before T-Day. As I find myself trying to recall in vivid detail, I find the event slightly hazy. Hope you'll understand.

Preservation Hall Jazz Band isn't what you'd call your basic acid-rock group. In fact, they have been responsible for a new trend in music, "geriatric jazz." They are all accomplished musicians in the New Orleans/Dixieland tradition. The pattern of their songs was fairly predictable. The basic melody was played, followed by a solo from each member of the band. The make-up of the band is stand-up bass, trombone, trumpet, drums, banjo, and clarinet. Most of the tunes were unfamiliar to me, not being a Dixieland afficionado. Though I was prepared for an older group of gentlemen, I didn't expect just how old they would be. At 55 years old, the drummer was the whippersnapper of the crew. His sporadic shouts of "Yeah!" and bizarre vocal inflections sparked the amusement of the audience to no end. The antics of trumpeteer "Kid" Valentine Thomas also captured the crowd. At one point near the end of the show, "The Kid" wandered off-stage and disappeared. I thought it might have been some problem with his ticker, considering the "Kid" is close to 80 years old, the likelihood of a heart attack could not be dismissed. But "The Kid" was no slouch – He bopped down the side aisle of Memorial Auditorium like a gazelle. With a kerchief over his head, he paraded up the center aisle, took a breather in a vacant tenth row seat, then, blew a solo to the band on-stage, who were still wailing away. Quite impressive...

By this point the audience had been completely won over. The slam bang finale had made up for the sameness of the material heard most of the evening. The Preservation Hall Jazz Band are professionals, and proved this most definitely Wednesday evening. And by the way, those rumors of Geritol spiked with LSD are totally untrue – I just don't know who would be cruel enough to start such an untruth circulating on this campus. I cannot confirm or deny rumors of some souped-up Pepto Bismal however...

Now here's the good part – I must say that Kenny Mirman's letter which appeared in the last issue certain turned some heads around the old Cynic office, as well as many people I spoke with after its publication. This is more or less of a statement of support, because I have to say that I agreed with much of what he said. It is very frustrating to do anything on a weekly basis, such as a Cynic column, and to receive the feeling that hardly anyone has read it. People who write angry letters criticizing articles, or the Cynic in general are certainly entitled to their opinion. The only way to improve a paper such as the Cynic is for more people to get involved with it – As it is now, there are only a handful of students who work on it with any dedication. When you consider that close to 8,000 people go to UVM, and then look at how many people write on a weekly basis, the figures just don't jive. I'm glad Kenny (whom I do not know personally) will continue to draw Five. It's too bad it will no longer grace the Cynic's pages though. One can only hope that it will not cause a "Lemming" effect, with people jumping a sinking ship. This is your Captain signing off. Beam me up, Spock.

At Last:
The Sound Of Vermont

Close your eyes and dream or clap your hands and stomp your feet – a new record album has just been released featuring all Vermont talent.

Entitled The Sound of Vermont, the record is a joint venture among a variety of musical groups, a local record company, a Vermont artist, and a Vermont bank.

Featured on side A are Peter Isaacson, Pine Island String Band, Road Apple, Banjo Dan & Midnight Plowboys, Coco & Lonesome Road Band, the Johnson Jazz Ensemble, and the John Cassel Band. They play jazz, folk, old timey, country, and blue grass music.

Side B in its entirety features the Vermont Symphony Orchestra playing the Allegro from Tchaikovsky's Romeo and Juliet and Vivaldi's

Works to be played are: Brahms' F major Sonata, Opus 99; Beethoven's A major Sonata, Opus 69; and a Debussy sonata. Natasha Paden will play solo, Chopin's F minor Fantasy, Opus 49. The artists chose these pieces for their power and profundity – they are epic works by these four great composers.

The concert will begin at 8 p.m., with holiday refreshments following the performance. Admission is by a six dollar donation, the proceeds supporting this concert as well as those presented by the Museum in the future. For reservations, R.S.V.P. by check before December 5 to the Robert Hull Fleming Museum, University of Vermont, Burlington.

Student Directed One Act Festival

A Festival of One Acts will be presented in three parts at the Royall Tyler Theatre on December 5-6, 9-10, 13-14.

Opening the Festival on December 5-6 are The Toilet, written by Leroi Jones and Doing a Good One for the Red Man by Mark Medoff.

Lyle Ferguson will direct The Toilet.

Doing a Good One for the Red Man, directed by Dan Cournoyer, can be described as a "red farce." The stereotyped characters, Leonard (Douglas Greenhaus), Grace (Barbara Hillman), and the Indian (Andrew Feldman), provide a comic relief from life's tensions. The tragic overtones of this comedy pit the white man's ignorance against the anger of an oppressed Indian attempting to cope with life in modern America. Mark Medoff is best known for his play When You Comin' Home, Red Ryder, winner of an Obie Award and also voted one of the ten best plays of 1973 by the New York Drama Critics.

Designers for Doing A Good One for the Red Man are Steven Sysko and Martha Armstrong.

The One-Acts Festival will continue on Dec. 9-10 with After Magritte by Tom Stoppard and A Resounding Tinkle by N.F. Simpson.

After Magritte, which is under the direction of Peter Delorenzo, is a ridiculous play about a household invaded by an Officer of the law and his bumbling assistant. The cast includes James Kowal, Jan Backus, Joan Kennedy, Patrick Orr and Jon Bourne. The set is designed by James Kowal and Melanie Donovan. Susan Reed is the Stage Manager.

A Resounding Tinkle, directed by Kevin Meconi, is an absurdist play revolving around the Paradocks (Tim Boisvert and Brooke Gladstone) who receive a gift of extraordinary size. They encounter one problem after another, including a visit by Uncle Ted, played by Millicent Preston, in trying to resolve the issue. The play is cyclical in nature as Simpson spoofs everyday banal existence and satires basic institutions. Karen Eisler is the State Manager and the set will be designed by Ed Tracy and Susan Reed.

The One Acts will close on Dec. 13-14 with The Day the Whores Came Out to Play Tennis by Arthur Kopit and Lou Gehrig Did Not Die of Cancer by Jason Miller.

Whores, directed by Karen Trott, is somewhat of a parody of Chekov's Cherry Orchard, an established class in the process of being ousted by a lower order. The committee members of the Cherry Valley Country Club find their tennis courts occupied by eighteen "women of ill repute." The members remain onstage throughout the duration of the performance in the club's nursery where they have congregated, as it offers the best view of the "ladies." Included in the all male cast are Peter Kurth, Dave Mainer, Patrick Orr, Craig Purinton, Hamilton Gillett and David Godkin. Designers are Beth Phiney, Lorie Combias and Lynda Kinney. Jeffrey Blum is the Stage Manager.

Lou Gehrig Did Not Die of Cancer, directed by Paul Ugalde, is a poignant but light treatment of the inter-relationships of three modern day people. This one act study in character confrontations is enacted by Kent Cassella as Victor Spinilli, Barbara Hillman as Barbara Spinilli and Sally Faye Relt as Helen Martin. Jason Miller is well known for his Pulitzer Prize winning play, That Championship Season, as well as for his performance as Father Karras in The Exorcist. Mr Miller was also a member of the 1964 Champlain Shakespeare Festival company.

Presented each semester by the Department of Communication and Theatre, the One Acts are the major projects of the Directing class. Participating in the One Acts are the students from classes in Basic Scene Design, Stage Costuming, Lighting and Stagecraft, along with other interested individuals.

Curtain time is at 8:00. Admission is free and the public is cordially invited.

Lane Series Extra:

Concord String Quartet

Chamber music enthusiasts will get their fill of string ensemble playing next week when the Concord String Quartet presents two concerts, December 8 and December 10, under the auspices of the Lane Series.

A Lane extra, the Concord Quartet will offer two evenings of the six quartets of Bela Bartok in the Recital Hall of the New Music Building beginning at 8 p.m.

The Concord Quartet will be in residence on the UVM Campus Dec. 8, 9 and 10, with workshops and meetings with students on Dec. 9.

The Quartet will offer Bartok's Quartets numbers 2, 3 and 5 on Dec. 8, and numbers 1, 4 and 6 on Dec. 10

The Concord String Ensemble, now on its second year as Quartet-in-residence at Dartmouth College, each year makes an extensive tour of the United States, performing on the major college campuses from Yale to the University of California, and appearing on leading chamber music series throughout the country.

Soon after its formation in 1971, the Concord String Quartet won the Walter W. Naumburg Chamber Music Award, and was similarly honored by the Fromm Music Foundation at Harvard University. The Concord maintains a large and varied repertoire ranging from most works of the standard repertoire to many of the more obscure ones like the quartets of Arriaga and the Schoenberg Quartet Concerto. Of particular interest is their commitment to the performance and commissioning of new works--a commitment which has resulted in new quartets from some of America's leading composers, among them George Rochberg, Lukas Foss, and Jacob Druckman.

Shortly after premiering Rochberg's String Quartet No.3--commissioned by the Concord as part of the Naumburg Award--they recorded it for Nonesuch (H-71283). The Concord Quartet also records for Vox, CRI, and Turnabout. Their latest releases include Charles Ives' String Quartet No.1 and No.2 (Nonesuch H-71306) and the Avant Garde String Quartet in the USA, a three-record set for Vox (SVBX 5306).

The members of the Quartet includes Mark Sokol, first violin, a native of Seattle, who studied at the Juilliard School with Dorothy Delay and Robert Mann. Before joining the Concord ensemble he was a member of the Center for the Creative and Performing Arts at the University of Buffalo.

Second violin is Andrew Jennings, from Buffalo, who also graduated from the Juilliard School, where he worked with Ivan Galamian and members of the Juilliard Quartet. He has made several recordings of solo works and has given numerous recital and orchestral appearances.

John Kochanowski, viola, also studied at the Juilliard School, where his teachers included Walter Trampler and Robert Mann. A native of Indiana, Mr. Kochanowski toured Europe as soloist prior to joining the Concord Quartet.

Cello is Norman Fischer, the lone Oberlin graduate in the Concord. At Oberlin he studied with Bernard Greenhouse and Claus Adam. Mr. Fischer has appeared as recitalist and soloist throughout the eastern part of the US.

The Dec. 8 and 10 concerts will give chamber music enthusiasts a rare opportunity to hear Bartok's six quartets, which are infrequently performed. Bela Bartok (1881–1945) was a Hungarian composer who settled in the US in 1940. A virtuoso pianist, he cultivated Hungarian national music style, and partly in association with Kodaly collected and edited Hungarian folksongs. His own works – often atonal and with extreme dissonance – include operas, mime-plays, piano music, and orchestral dance suites and concerti, as well as trios, quartets and songs.

The Quartet will give a workshop on December 9, at 4 p.m. in the Recital Hall, New Music Building, under the coordination of Prof. Thomas Read of the UVM Music Department. The Quartet will hear and criticize student groups at this time; students and others are invited as participants and observers.

At Living and Learning, 8 p.m. on Dec. 9, the members of the Quartet will hold an informal meeting with students under the coordination of Mr. Brian Lloyd. Students and others are invited. The Quartet will be staying at Living and Learning.

For the Dec. 8 and 10 concerts there are special prices for students:

$2 for a single concert and $3 for two concerts. Tickets for others are $4 a single concert and $6 for two concerts. Tickets are on sale in the Lane Office, 234 Waterman. Tel 656-3418 for reservations.

Nazi Cat and Mouse

by Scott Curtis

The Hiding Place is the true story of the Ten Boom family's defiance of hatred through their love for others. The setting is occupied Amsterdam during the Second World War. As the Jews are fleeing a sure death in Germany, the Ten Booms offer their watch shop and house for a sanctuary, a hiding place. The others are compromising with the Nazis, the Ten Boom family remains true to humanity through their faith in Christ.

The first portion of the film is a dangerous but delightful cat and mouse game. The house is arranged so that dozens of Jewish refugees can be hidden in only a few minutes. One is amused as a professor dresses as Betsy Ten Boom and rides a bicycle to freedom. The amusement comes to a violent halt.

The Nazis raid the Ten Boom shop and old bearded Papa Ten Boom and his middle aged daughters are taken to concentration camp. The loveable Papa Ten Boom, played by Arthur O'Connell, becomes sick and dies. His ebulently faithful daughters, Betsie and Corrie, are subjected to unbelievable hardships at the women's labor camp. At one point Katie, a hardened prisoner, tries to persuade Corrie to stop praying and loving and to begin to hate in order to survive. Yet Corrie, though she falters, manages to stay true to her Master, as she continues to love and forgive as Christ did.

The story captivates the audience as it expresses the horror of the situation without slipping into sensationalism. Julie Harris, as Betsie, evokes much admiration for her character, who suffers dearly yet remains the light of the world. Jeanette Clift, as Corrie, is the weaker sister, and she conveys the anguish between faith and doubt, and love and hate. Eileen Heckart, as Katie, portrays the hardened woman who is softened by the love of the Ten Booms. In all, the film rings with the integrity of the noble and true story. (The film is based on Corrie Ten Boom's book, The Hiding Place.)

Russian Christmas with UVM Band

For the first time in several years, the University of Vermont Concert Band will give a fall performance, to be held on December 7 at 8:00 p.m. in the Ira Allen Chapel. The program, reflecting the festive spirit of the holiday season, will include works by Alfred Reed, Rinsky-Korsakov, and Leroy Anderson.

One selection to be performed, written especially for the Christmas season is "Russian Christmas Music," by Alfred Reed. An ancient Russian Christmas Carol ("Carol of the Little Russian Children") forms the basis of this musical impression of Old Russia during the jubilant Christmas season. Although cast in the form of a single, continous movement, four distinct sections may be easily recognized. Performed for the first time in November, 1944, by a select group of musicians from five of the leading service bands stationed in Denver, Colorado, "Russian Christmas Music" has remained in the repertory of the concert band, and has established the composer as one of the most important writers for the contemporary band or wind ensemble.

The December 7 concert will be the first concert activity of the Band for the current year. In addition, the Band generates school spirit in the form of Pep Band at basketball and hockey games during the winter season, as well as performing at high schools during a three-day period in spring semester, promoting "good will" and recruiting potential Band members.

Admission is free and the public is cordially invited to attend..

Concerto in D for four solo violins, harpsichord and strings.

In announcing release of the record, John T. Carter, senior vice president of Chittenden Trust Company explained that the project was developed by the bank and Earth Audio Techniques, Inc. of North Ferrisburg, Vermont. Close cooperation to produce the unique album came from William H. Schubart, president of the record company, Efrain Guigui, the Symphony's musical director and conductor, the individual musicians, and Sabra Johnson Field of South Royalton, Vermont whose "Farm in East Barnard" from an original woodcut appears in the jacket cover. The bank has also added the 24" x 22" woodcut print to its permanent art collection.

Carpenter noted that the bank has long supported and encouraged the arts in Vermont and wanted to sponsor a unique collection of music by Vermont artists.

The Sound of Vermont is available at any Chittenden Trust Company office in Vermont either as a premium item or for direct purchase as long as the supply lasts.

First Student Assembly Meets

by Randy Jensen

The first Student General Assembly was held last Thursday in accordance with the new constitution. Staige Davis, SA President, opened the meeting with a few remarks laying down a few ground rules for discussion.

Approximately 120 students attended the meeting, which was termed "satisfactory" by S.A. The students not only voted on measures, but were asked to provide input into several general questions.

Students voiced their approval of the Gym and Library expansion, contingent upon the actual cost per student. The trustees will be notified of the students' feeling at the trustees meeting dealing with these matters.

SA's textbook exchange was also approved by the General Assembly. SA will set up Bulletin Boards in the North Lounge for next semester. Course will be listed in alphabetical order on these boards. If a student has a book to sell or wants to buy a book, he/she puts the necessary information on an index card and pins it under the course title on the board.

Four new student associations were recognized: The Way – Biblical Research and Teaching — Campus Outreach, the International Club, the Student Sex Information Service and the UVM Volleyball Club.

All clubs requesting funding were granted their allocations. Most of the discussion dealt with the Ariel request of $16,000, the largest amount requested. It was passed with 54 students in favor and 29 opposed.

The President of the S.A. Staige Davis indicated he was pleased by the attendance of 120 students, but indicated it was a small percentage for a 7000 enrollment. Staige felt they learned organization procedure from the first student assembly. He commented that the assembly was for too long and that the next meeting will have a time limit.

Several other topics including SA Concerts and Student Sex Information Service were discussed and the meeting was adjourned at 9:10 p.m.

Textbook Prices Continue To Rise

by Cynthia Crossen

(CPS) – Standing in the aisles of college bookstores across the country are hundreds of students groaning and sighing as they peek cautiously at the price on the inside cover of the assigned textbook. Their heads swim as they silently tally up the bill for this semester's required books.

Next semester will be worse if book prices continue to rise as they have steadily for the past 10 years. Prices for publishing materials have fallen victim to inflation and the financially-troubled textbook industry is passing those increases on to its captive audience – students.

The textbook is still the primary teaching tool in the majority of undergraduate classes. And college students at most school stores pay exactly what the publishers have suggested. Trying to undercut the competing bookstores in the area would result in a serious loss to the bookstore since the profit margin on textbooks is so low, according to the manager of a University of Minnesota bookstore.

"We make far less than one percent profit after all our expenses are taken out," claimed Jim Simons, manager of the bookstore at Oregon College of Education. Simons also said that many bookstores are not getting enough to cover the cost of the books, shipping and handling. To cover the cost, some college bookstores are charging students for the freight cost as well as the actual cost of the textbooks.

According to Simons, textbook prices have not risen as drastically this year as they have in the past few years. "However, hard-cover $7.95 and $8.95 books might be a thing of the past," he said.

Actually, textbook prices rose 3% more than the consumer index in 1974. Publishers blamed the rising prices on increasing costs of paper, ink, binding material, labor, loans and distribution. Today the average price of a hard-cover book is about $13.25, a college librarian estimated.

Publishers are also spending more money producing textbooks because they are trying to recruit more big-name professors to write the newest texts. Then it takes the busy professor four to six years to produce it. By the time the student is buying the book, it is already dated and a new edition is in the works.

At most bookstores, an outdated edition is worth nothing. Books which have been used for one quarter or semester and have not been reordered by another professor for the next are worth almost nothing. The manager of the University bookstore at Stephen Austin University in Texas pointed out that a book which retailed for $9.75 would be worth 25 cents to the wholesaler if the book were no longer needed for a class at that school.

If a book is going to be used again for the next semester, students may be able to buy the textbook used, usually at 75% of its original price. But with the heavier use of paperback texts, used books are becoming more scarce. Some book dealers believe paperbacks are the student's worst buy.

"There's very little price difference between paperback and hardback books in certain instances," one said. "Hardback books are also more durable than paperback books and attain a higher resale value."

Not all bookstores seem to be struggling with low prices and high costs, however. The "non-profit" bookstore at Western Washington State College has accumulated a surplus of $297,000 in the past few years. The bookstore gives discounts on many items but continues to show a profit. Many bookstores make their biggest profits on non-book items such as pocket calculators, clothing and supplies.

Weiger Steps Down As Dean

by Charles Kountze

Dr. John G. Weiger, Dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, has announced that he will relinquish the post in order to devote his full energies as a member of the faculty.

Dr. Weiger was appointed Dean of the College in 1971, after three years in which he was successively Assistant Dean, Associate Dean, and Acting Dean. He came to the University of Vermont in 1958 as a professor of Romance Languages.

On September 1, 1976, Dr. Weiger will take his first sabbatical leave of absence. He plans to spend some of this time in Spain doing research for his second book.

Following is an interview conducted with Dr. Weiger by the Vermont Cynic.

Cynic: What basically are your reasons for leaving the office of Dean?

Weiger: My main reason is that I feel I have simply been in the post too long. It's my contention that one should not remain in the position too long, the ideal stay being somewhere around five years. I now have been in the administration for seven years. And too, I'd like to get back to academic affairs and teaching after being an administrator for so long.

Cynic: What do you feel have been the rewards and the disadvantages?

Weiger: I would say that my greatest reward has been the success we have had in recruiting energetic and talented faculty members. In my estimation the faculty is markedly better now than when I first came into the administration. Second, being an administrator has allowed me to gain perspectives and to understand other disciplines better, which I feel will help me in being a better professor when I return.

One disadvantage has been the fact that I served as dean while the budgets were being trimmed and cut back. This naturally has limited my ability to do certain things, such as provide better salaries for faculty members and better budgets for various departments.

Cynic: What are your plans for the Sabbatical?

Weiger: I plan to spend about half of my time in Spain working on my second book and doing further research. It's to be called The Valencian Dramatists of Spain's Golden Age, published by Twayne Publishers of Boston. I also have an offer from a Spanish publishing house to publish a third book, so I will be busy.

The other half of my time will probably be spent researching in the library here and at Harvard.

Cynic: What do you plan when you return?

Weiger: I will return to my position as a full time, tenured professor in the Spanish department. Many people have asked where could I possibly go after being a dean, what could I do next? My reply to them, in closing, is that one always steps up to a professorship, not down.

Join the third biggest family in the world.

Imagine an order of 22,000 priests and brothers in 73 countries around the world. (That's a pretty big family.)

But that's what the Salesians of St. John Bosco are all about – a large family of community-minded men dedicated to the service of youth. (And no one gets lost.)

In the 1800's a chance meeting between a poor priest and a street urchin served to create a movement of such success that it is still growing today. Don Bosco became the priest who brought youth back from the streets – and back to God.

He reasoned that a program of play, learn and pray would make useful citizens of the world. He crowded out evil with reason, religion and kindness in a (what was then unheard of) atmosphere of family spirit.

The ideals of St. John Bosco are still with us today. His work goes on in boys clubs, technical and academic schools, guidance centers, summer camps and missions. And his very human approach is very evident in the family spirit of the Salesians. This is the way he wanted it. This is the way it is. The Salesian experience isn't learned – it's lived.

Outing Club Expands

by David Williams

The newly reorganized Outing Club is beginning to become a solid, structured group. Previously, the Outing Club had received 1200 dollars from the Student Association. Now, after many hours of hard preparation, the Outing Club will receive an additional 3,300 dollars. This money will be used to the utmost to provide University of Vermont with a respectable Outing Club for this location. John Nininger, the new president, and other members plan to use this money for various plans. One goal is to provide a means of visiting the many outdoor areas in Vermont as well as those in New England, New York and Canada, thus fulfilling a need expressed by 80% of the student body which stated location as a major factor in choosing UVM. Another goal is to provide instruction and equipment for the activities which have and will occur in this excellent location. Some of the Outing Club's activities includes hiking, canoeing, kayaking, rock and ice climbing, bicycling, winter camping, first aid, orienteering, astronomy, and wilderness survival.

Outing Club supplies equipment for outdoor fun.

This additional money will be used to help solve the two major problems of an Outing Club trip – equipment and transportation. The Outing Club will be able to increase the present equipment list used in past activities and add new equipment for new activities. Also a sewing machine may be obtained to repair equipment and to make new equipment from kits. For example, members may make a sleeping bag at a much cheaper cost than buying the same type from a store.

Transportation is the second biggest problem. In the past, private vehicles were used to provide transportation. This year, the Outing Club will use the Student Association van for many trips. Also, this money will be used for renting vans and school buses from private companies. All these vehicles will allow more people to go on Outing Club trips planned in New England and New York.

This new money will help solve these two major problems. A committee will be formed to assure that the money is used in the best interests. The Outing Club members are very excited about helping the organization become more attractive to others. With the new funds and enthusiasm, our goals may be reached.

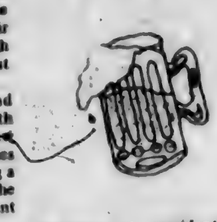
Student Drinking Meets Opposition

by Daniel B. Hesam

Oktoberfest at Castleton State College suddenly finds itself without its "schnapps" as local officials step in and block a 15-keg beer blast at the state school shortly before it was to have begun earlier this fall. The organizers of a campus-wide UVM dance featuring a band and an open bar in Simpson Hall hastily make refunds and rebate arrangements at the door after they are told their function is to be left – high and dry – with the band but without the booze.

These recent events and other potential problems with the enforcement of a state law which prohibits state colleges and universities from holding a liquor license have aroused the concern of several student officials.

"It's a question of enforcement," Student Association (S.A.) president Staige Davis commented, referring to the law which he said could be "selectively enforced" to allow alcoholic problem at a meeting of the S.A. Activities Committee. He said that a Castleton student had contacted him, angrily suggesting that local pressure had been applied to call a halt to that state college's Oktoberfest. While both Davis and university officials assert that there has been no evidence of pressure from local authorities or interests concerning functions involving alcohol on campus, both admit that potential problems do exist.



Dr. Steve Peterson, director of residential life on campus, expressed concern for both the interests of the local tavern owners and the students in avoiding a legal dispute over the use of alcohol in the dormitories.

Referring to the Simpson hall incident, he said that any change in precedent in the handling of the event came as a "clarification" by his office as to university guidelines on mass consumption of alcoholic beverages on university property.

He denied any suggestion that the change came as a result of a new policy, and of a possible change in policy he said, "I don't know that that's any different, either."

Peterson said he was unaware of the Castleton College incident, and he echoed other university officials in giving assurances that no outside pressures have attempted to influence university policy on alcoholic beverages. The residence halls director said that he was keenly aware of the consequences of competition between dormitory functions and the bar business downtown. "That's one of the reasons we make sure everyone (dormitory personnel) understands the guidelines," he said.

Despite the apparent ambivalence of the university administration towards drinking on the UVM campus, student leaders seem cautious about the present regulations and their future effects on campus activities. Representatives of the student association are asking for a clarification of the rules by the administration.

beverages at presidential or alumni receptions but not at student functions. This interpretation, he said, is "probably hurting students more than anyone else."

Sexism In Broadcasting

(WASHINGTON) — A task force has concluded after conducting the first major study of women in broadcasting that sex discrimination exists at all levels of employment in public radio and television.

The task force of women in public broadcasting said women hold almost 30 percent of the jobs in public broadcasting but most are clerical or support positions. Men outnumber them ten to one in the top slots.

In addition, the task force concluded, there appears to be a double standard for men and women because women are segregated into lower-paid dead-end jobs from which they are rarely promoted. That's while men with comparable education and experience are brought in at mid-professional levels and move upward.

The task force was created last year by the corporation for public broadcasting after allegations that women were being shown in public radio and television programs in a distorted way. The report, which was made to the corporation, will be released officially Tuesday.

Energy Saved Through Bottle Ban

(CPS) – Twenty years ago, the glass bottling industry recognized a bonanza in the throw-away bottle and through a nation-wide advertising campaign urged Americans to "go throw-away." Americans went along with the trend and today, 13.5 billion non-returnable bottles are produced every year.

A few states have taken stock of the throw-away bottle idea and decided it was increasing litter and inflating prices. So Oregon passed a law requiring a minimum deposit on all soft drink containers, which has resulted in almost a complete shift back to refillables. Since then, beverage container litter had declined by 66% there.

Vermont and South Dakota have also passed throw-away laws. Residents of these three states have heavily favored the laws.

A complete return to refillable bottles throughout the US would save consumers more than one billion dollars a year. And by converting to a complete refillable system, the beverage industry could reduce energy consumption to 40 to 50% without any decrease in the amount of soft drinks consumed.

Year 'Round Kite Flying

by Dawn McGinnis

It was sunny and the wind was calm on Sunday afternoon when Arthur Stultz showed me his kites. His garage was filled with splashes of color: a splash of blue box kite, a purple delta, a brilliant red flat kite, and a kaleidoscope of color in the delicate butterfly-shaped Tet kite.

There was a traditional diamond-shaped kite (technically called the Eddy Bow after William Eddy who designed it in the early 1800's) made of newspaper, a purple delta kite that looks like a silk skinned bat, and a graceful Bell Tetra (invented by Alexander Graham Bell) which looks more like a geometric sculpture than an object capable of flying.

Arthus Stultz was not a boy; he is a middle-aged man who teaches auto mechanics at the Essex Junction Educational Center. His hobby is building and flying kites.

Stultz has built 17 kites in the last two years. All of these have been variations of one of seven basic designs. He has invented two electric kite-line winders – a large one for a heavy day of flying and a smaller one for spur-of-the-moment flying.

Stultz has put up a flag in his backyard and from it he can tell the strength and direction of the wind. When the conditions are right he packs his equipment into the car and takes off to the Essex Junction Educational Center's athletic field or to a farmer's field or to any other large, open area. Once there, he may launch only one kite, or he may fly several at a time in a kite train.

If the wind is right, his kites will go up easily. "If the kite goes right out of your hands it will break the string when it hits the high winds. If you have to coax it, maybe run with it a little, it will fly well when it hits the high winds," he explains.

Stultz has had a kite out as far as 6,000 feet, but that's not straight up because kites fly at a 45-degree angle to the ground. He's lost only three kites in two years, and one of those has been recovered.

The best kite line to use is 20 pound test fishing line. Regular kite string is the worst kind to use. Stultz sometimes uses braided nylon string that can withstand a pull of up to 177 pounds.

"One big advantage of kite flying," Stultz says, "is that it costs hardly anything." His kites are made of small strips of wood, twine, popsicle sticks, and inexpensive acetate cloth. He made his two kite-line winders from bits and pieces of things he already had.

Stultz is currently working on several new kites and he hopes to get the plans for his kite-line winder printed in the publication put out by the American Kite Flyers Association, of which he is a member.

He is trying to get a Chittenden County Kite Flying Association off the ground, but so far he has had no success.

The weather is getting colder, but Arthur Stultz is not putting away his kites. He has flown them in every month of the year. "How else," he asks, "can you get three hours of entertainment that doesn't cost a thing?"

Betty For Pres?

by Karen Perkins

When the Fords entered the White House in January of 1975, the First Lady's outspokenness shocked the American Public. Since that time Betty Ford has been known for being truthful and frank in her speeches and demonstrating her unusual independence from her husband, Gerry Ford. Her pronounced individuality has created not one major White House personality, but two.

Since the incident of Watergate and recent uncoverings concerning CIA integrity, our nation has been in a turmoil. The credibility gap seems to be growing larger and larger, and although we are still dependent on our government for decision making, it is a growing minority of people who actually turn toward the American government for support.

In her honesty, the First Lady has increased Ford's constituent support, and recently the public has been speaking of their residency as "Betty Ford's White House." There are even those who talk of nominating her for president, although conceivably it will not happen. But the idea of her for president is worth thinking about and should not be quickly dismissed. We might consequentially regain some of our faith in the American government.

A pronounced feminist, Betty Ford participates in interest group activities such as lobbying in Los Angeles for the Equal Rights Amendment for women. Unlike any other First Lady, she has freely commented on such controversial subjects as abortion, smoking marijuana, and premarital sex. Her frank and direct expression of opinion has undoubtedly stirred up much excitement in our continually liberalizing American society. Even the president himself was forced to admit to the public that he has been shocked by her outspokenness, although he has not contested to disagreement with her.

With her candid personality, Betty Ford has had no qualms about being personally interviewed concerning family life in the White House, as well as other subjects. She has also reacted calmly and remained controlled during hers and the President's public appearances instead of being tense and uptight as were several other previous First Ladies and presidents.

There is no doubt that Betty Ford has shaped the style of the White House and has been a major contributing factor in the public's opinion of President Ford. Her straightforward comments and air of confidence are definitely making history. The time has long since past when we could put our trust in any section of the government. At least now we should be grateful for a First Lady who is open to expression her own individuality as are the rest of us.

Lines On Wine

by R. Corbin Houchins
E&J Gallo Winery

Benjamin Franklin said, "Wine is constant proof that God loves us and loves to see us happy."

Unfortunately, some people aren't happy with wine unless they can reduce its appreciation to arguments akin to the number of angels that can be accommodated on the head of a pin.

To be sure, the glories of the grape are many and various. The last thing we need, however, is another self-proclaimed pundit swirling a glass and talking about the Gay-Lussac equation while claiming to perceive Gregorian chants and the Rites of Dionysius in the wine.

Just as one need not be a botanist to appreciate a rose or a meterologist to delight in a sunset, you need not be an enologist to enjoy a glass of wine.

It may be that wine snobs exist because table wine, the kind of wine that increases the pleasure of food (and hence the most important category from an aesthetic standpoint), is relatively new to America. For a long time, the pleasures of table wine have been taken for granted by American families with strong European heritages and by the upper class. But until relatively recently, only a minority of wines shipped in America were table wines. Only in 1969 did table wines make up the majority of shipments. Since then, the category has grown steadily both absolutely and relative to other types.

One of the by-products of the new popularity of fine wine was the wine snob, ready to dictate, pontificate, and obfuscate. There were special glasses to consider, the appropriate wine with each dish, not to mention correct temperatures and serving procedures. And the wines themselves had to be from places with strange and confusing names.

Fortunately, the consumer has discovered that enjoyment of table wine is not complicated. In the marketplace, if a wine is priced right, looks good, smells good, and tastes good, that is sufficient cause to buy it.

What some wine drinkers haven't realized is that straight-forward standards of what looks, smells, and tastes good are applicable to all wines. There is no compendium of tasting secrets known only to people who can say Grand Echezeaux five times fast. When the fundamentals are known, with a little practice you will discover that wines disdained by the snobs may stand very comfortably beside those famous European names. More importantly, you will find you are comfortable enough with good wines to share Ben Franklin's relaxed attitude – and that is the most important step toward real appreciation.

People's Rights Upheld

(CPS)—It's happened again, this time on the Oregon State University (OSU) campus. But for a change, the results show not everybody is as reactionary as some pollsters would have us believe.

Fifty OSU students were recently shown an excerpt from the Declaration of Independence and asked whether they agreed with it. According to the results published in the Barometer, the campus paper, 41 of the students said they agreed with the paragraph which talks about "the Right of the People to alter or abolish" a wayward government. The results run counter to several polls of recent years in which people asked if excerpts read to them were authored by Che Guevara rather than Thomas Jefferson.

In the OSU poll, in which only two students disagreed and seven were undecided, over half said they had read a similar statement elsewhere.

Nearly one quarter of the respondees even correctly identified the excerpt as from the Declaration of Independence.

QUESTION: I am interested in the whole concept involved concerning the idea of a human being becoming bionic. I realize that as of now it is only science fiction, but so was television years ago. What I would like to know is exactly what are bions and in what way are they used now? Do humans have any traces of bions in them and if so, is there any possibility of harnessing them in such a way that we can eventually have some of the properties of the "Six Million Dollar Man"?

ANSWER: A bion simply means "a living thing." Bionics is a term which is probably best defined as the combination of two words – biological electronics. In one sense, bionics have already been put to use and, in fact, installed within human bodies. The best example of this would be cardiac pacemakers.

There is a tremendous amount of research going on in other similar areas – for example, control of bladders which have lost their nerve supply. Work is also being done in attempting to attach artificial limbs to existing nerves so that nervous impulses can control limb motion. Thus, it is quite apparent we are already involved in the area of bionics and are, in fact, making use of the principles involved.

QUESTION: I hope you can answer this letter before the end of the quarter because I am leaving and I will never know whether I am going to die sooner than I anticipate. Several years ago my doctor informed me that I have a slight heart murmur. He said nothing more. I know technically what a murmur is, but I want to know if it shortens lives, if any special care should be taken or if the condition progressively worsens with age? Let me know soon so I can cooperate with my dear, sweet aorta.

ANSWER: A heart Murmur is purely an hydraulic phenomenon; i.e., a sound produced by the flowing of blood. At times the heart can be perfectly normal and yet a murmur can be heard. If this is the case, the murmur may be heard inconsistently; that is, it may be present at one time and at the next exam not be audible. This type of murmur, called a functional or physiological murmur, is most usually noted in children or young people and has no significance whatsoever.

Heart murmurs can also be caused by damage to a valve, such as might occur with rheumatic fever, or can be the result of a congenital defect to the heart, such as a septal defect (i.e., a hole in the membrane which divides the chambers of the heart). The problems associated with valvular defects of the heart can be progressive and regular evaluation by your physician is appropriate. Septal defects (and other similar congenital disorders) which cause heart murmurs, while not being progressive as far as the size of the defect, may be progressive in terms of damage to the heart muscle. At times, however, the defect may be so small that no particular treatment is indicated. At other times, surgical intervention is appropriate.

I would suspect from the tone of your question that you most likely had a physiological murmur. However, if you are concerned about this, it would be wise for you to consult with a physician.

QUESTION: Is it true that having sexual relations will clear up the acne on a woman's or man's face?

ANSWER: No.

QUESTION: What is a hiccup and what is the best way to stop them?

ANSWER: Either the term "hiccup" or "hiccough" is correct. The "hic" term must undoubtedly be derived from the noise made. A hiccough is caused by a muscular spasm of the diaphragm (the diaphragm is the sheet-like muscle which separates the chest cavity and the abdominal cavity).

The sudden spasm causes a sudden inhalation which is quickly interrupted by a sudden closure of the glottis (the glottis is made up of the various muscles and ligaments which form the vocal apparatus).

There have probably been as many old wives' tales for curing hiccoughs as there are old wives. For the usual case, simply following some procedure which tightens the diaphragmatic muscle for several seconds suffices. The usual way of doing this is as is well known, by breath holding or by drinking a glass of water.

I doubt that whether one drinks 25 sips or one sip is important; but, rather, the important factor seems to be how long one's glottis remains closed and the breath is held.

While those approaches seem to make sense to me, I recently came across a very preliminary report in a medical journal which suggested that certain researchers had found that the best treatment is swallowing a teaspoon of ordinary dry table sugar. I have not seen the total report so cannot comment further. Perhaps in the case of hiccoughs, at least three of the old wives were correct after all – or were they "old person's tales?"

QUESTION: I plan to spend some time in Europe. How does one go about finding a doctor in a foreign country?

ANSWER: There is a non-profit organization at 745 Fifth Avenue, New York, New York, 10022, named the International Association for Medical Assistance to Travelers, Inc. By writing to this organization, one can receive a medical directory of English-speaking physicians in 78 different countries.

The directory includes the physicians' names and addresses. Other sources of medical help while overseas include the Red Cross groups, medical associations and the United States Armed Forces installations.

If additional help is needed, one can contact the United States Embassy or Consulate. It is advisable, in my opinion, prior to an extended foreign trip, or, for that matter, an extended trip into a remote area of this country to see your private physician and dentist so that necessary preventive care can be performed.

••••••••••••••

QUESTION: I keep hearing commercials and seeing ads for all different kinds of skin creams, lotions, etc. How can one really decide which is the best?

ANSWER: All the skin products you describe are basically identical, being variations of the theme of cold cream which consists basically of a mixture of oil and water. Ingredients may be added to make the preparations more or less liquid, to make them smell different or to prevent spoilage.

Many of them, of course, have been modified to be skin softeners rather than skin cleansers, the latter having been the usual use for cold cream. The preparations which are to be left on after application are simply made less greasy than cold cream.

The basic purpose of these preparations, other than those used simply for cleansing the skin, is to "prevent dryness of the skin." However, the skin's dryness is a reflection of the amount of water which the superficial skin layers contain and simply applying an oily preparation will not replace the water. Such preparations do, of course, leave a film on the skin's surface, which makes it look and feel softer and smoother.

None of the above is to indicate that there is not some value in these products, since making the skin look and feel smoother is certainly a cosmetic advantage and the aesthetic appeal of a scented lotion is obvious.

Lost Desire

(CPS) — South Carolina students just aren't that interested in sex anymore, if the enrollment in a University of South Carolina short course in lovemaking is any indication. The course was cancelled this year due to lack of student interest.

The course covered the physiology of sex organs, masturbation, homosexuals and other topics students were interested in.

Gynecologist W.M. Bryan, the instructor, said that students used to come "in droves. Every Monday night at 7, they filled the amphitheater with 300 to 400 people."

Bryan said attendance dropped, either because "the excitement wore off or everyone knew what they wanted to. Only a handful of students started attending and I just felt it was no longer needed."

What the University needs now, Bryan said, is a course in the psychological implications of sex or a course on venereal disease.

Craft Shop Opens

The Shelburne Craft School has opened a Craft Shop in its weaving building on Harbor Road near the center of Shelburne. It is a small, friendly shop stocked with many examples of craftwork done by present and past instructors and students of the Craft School. There is hand-thrown stoneware pottery by Judith Bryant and Ted Scatchard. The woodworking by Woody Smith, Ed Schumer and Peter Marsh includes turned bird's eye maple plates, wine goblets and mirrors; Betty Atwood's weaving includes beautiful woven wheels showing Indian influence; Tricia Sauer has woven pillows on display as well. There is also hand worked silver jewelry by Tim McCreight; and bone jewelry, including some scrimshaw, by Bruce and Stephany Hasse. Karen Wenig, a printmaker from Lincoln, has done silk screened prints and lithographs for the shop; Montana and Ken Martin have a display of sand-casted candles. There is, as well, everything from stained glass to pin cushions, all created by crafts people associated with the Craft School.

The Craft School has been offering educational classes to the adults of this area for over thirty years now. The school's first building was the weaving building in which the Craft Shop now resides. This red frame building was once a harness repair and wagon paint shop. Behind it, where the Craft School pottery studio now stands, was a livery stable; and next to it was the blacksmith shop which has since been moved to the Shelburne Museum. This complex once served as a shopping center for Shelburne's early farmers. Today the Craft School with its Weaving, Pottery, Woodworking and Art Buildings (including a silver work and stained glass studio) continues to provide service to the area.

The Craft Shop is the most recent addition to this tradition. It was started and is being run as a co-operative effort by the craftspeople. It is open Fridays from noon to 8 p.m., and Saturdays and Sundays from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. It will be open by appointment only Monday through Thursday. This can be arranged by calling Bonnie Thomas at the Craft School, 985-3548. Interested persons may also sign up for the Craft School's winter classes in the Craft Shop.

Athenians Mourn Dead

by Ellen Holmes

November 17

The Citizens of Athens mourned their dead today. Banners hung outside the city's universities and political pamphlets were passed out. Flower venders sold carnations. It is the custom here to send wreaths, bouquets, or single flowers to the Polytechnic Institute. In 1973 between 20 and 200 students (depending on whose report you read) protesting the 'Xunta' were crushed under the treads of government tanks. The students were defending their takeover of the Polytechnic Institute, an event which many see as the catalyst for the 'Xunta's' downfall.

The gates upon which the students clung, in the face of those tanks, can still be seen. In fact they are displayed upon a grassy patch. One gazes at the pieces of metal – gnarled, flattened, and burnt – and imagines them once erect... the picture of twisted steel and crushed bodies is truly haunting. It is a very real picture, too. I've met people here whose friends were on that gate.

This afternoon it is not only the young, idealistic students of 1975 who gather at the Polytechnic. There are young children wide-eyed with wonder, old men swinging worry beads, women dressed in black, and whole families. One gets the feeling of silent indignation. Over the din of the crowd, political songs are broadcast. Occasionally speakers interrupt – "Out with the Americans! Down with NATO!... Remember the Polytechnic!" But, nevertheless there is an unusual hush to the typical Greek clamor.

I bought some flowers with a friend. And we tied them to the fence surrounding the institute. We also attached a note to the bouquet. It said something to the effect that "We American students sympathize with Greek students and together honor those that died." Shortly thereafter I glanced back and saw someone reading our message. What would his reaction be, I wondered, anti-Americanism runs strong. But the man who read the note neither laughed cynically, nor shook his fist... rather he bent down and kissed the flowers.

And as I sit here on a balcony overlooking Athens reflecting on the past few days searching for a conclusion, I can only end with a feeling... that somehow the juxtaposition of our two realities – mine here in Greece and yours in the States – is meaningful.

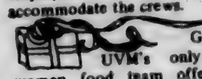
Your Horror (?) Scope

by Dean Jixon
(Special to Saga)

Your life is ruled by forces, some more cosmic than others. Some believe the stars rule man, others believe the true ruler is closer to home.

Find your Saga Sign and you too can learn to control that ruling force – your stomach. If your Saga Sign is:

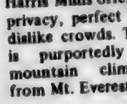
Den: Mike Donnelly runs luncheon specials every day for under $1.00. Billings Bedlam is slated for December 6 and steak and eggs and popcorn and hot cider are among the items planned for the all night affair. Three cooks and three cashiers at peak hours are now employed in order to accommodate the crews.



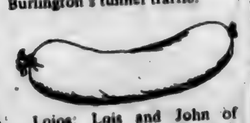
Given: UVM's only all women food team offers a quiet and pleasant alternative to the crowds and volume of the Den. The small cafeteria in the Given Medical Building features home made soups of excellence and is sometimes referred to as the "country club" of UVM's dining halls.

HAM

Harris Millis: Breakfast at Harris Millis offer intimacy and privacy, perfect for those who dislike crowds. The dining hall is purportedly run by a mountain climber returned from Mt. Everest.



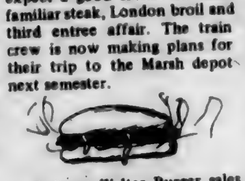
Living/Learning: As the cold weather approaches, the top of the campus remains an excellent spot for those hardy souls who wish to dine outdoors and enjoy the uncluttered view of Burlington's tunnel traffic.



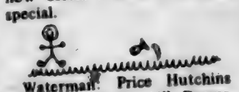
Lojos: Lois and John of Church Street fame, have moved to campus featuring hot dogs and sauerkraut and grated parmesan cheese. A "tube steak" is a new alternative at UVM and can be found next to the library.

Marsh: Bob Schondelmier (13 letters long) plans another drive in movie night, complete with milkshakes and hamburgers. Bob plans to better the last event when participants saw (or tried to see) movies in broad daylight. Nikinor Botista and the bakery's crew are now operating out of Marsh rather than Simpson where the bakers can be viewed in action.

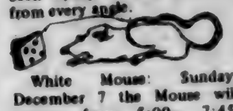
Redstone Station: The only trainride this semester will be December 13. Tom and Jan expect a good crowd for their familiar steak, London broil and third entree affair. The train crew is now making plans for their trip to the Marsh depot next semester.



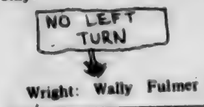
Walters: Walter Burger sales are steadily climbing and rumor has it Walter is designing a sales record sign to rival McDonald's with spaces for billions served. The snackbar now offers a steak and salad special.



Waterman: Price Hutchins has joined "Big Al" Dwyer. Waterman now features meat and glazed donuts for breakfast and Price is busily preparing for the Christmas special Dec. 10. Rearrangement is occuring in the Food Service Director's office and Ron Beaulieu has been trying out the furniture from every angle.



White Mouse: Sunday, December 7 the Mouse will reopen from 5:00– 7:45. UVM's only waitressed service offers steak, London broil, baked stuffed shrimp, and steamed clams. Reservations only.



Wright: Wally Fulmer has moved from Simpson to help boy wonder Gary Jones. Weird Wally's magic shows have moved also and a great ping pong tournament is planned for December 9. Wally will award a dinner to those who win a match. Chauvinist Wally said girls can play left handed and guys right handed. Game time is 4:45.

Note: This article is the renaissance of the "Saga Sez" series. The new column will announce specials, answer questions, and expose the dining services at UVM. Please address all correspondence to Dr. Food in care of Waterman Dining Hall, UVM. Next week will be an in-depth analysis of what's happening at Simpson.

Two Deputies Killed

(MOBILE, ALABAMA) – Authorities say two sheriff's deputies were shot and killed in a cross-fire ambush Tuesday as they searched for two men who had fled a drivers license check. And police say a man sought in the shootings later was found dead of a gunshot wound near the Alabama–Mississippi line.

Police believe the deputies were cut down in a crossfire of shotgun blasts. The Mobile County Sheriff's Department said the mortally wounded deputies managed to return the fire, and one slug apparently hit one of their attackers in the chest.

Police say the Sheriff's men were killed by shotgun wounds in the back. But investigators say the deputies, although caught in an ambush, still managed to empty their revolvers.

The shootings took place while the deputies were searching the woods behind a vacant house in West Mobile County.

Homes in the sparsely settled region were boarded up as word of the gun battle spread. Children at a nearby school were kept late.

The Sheriff's Department said the fatal shootings occurred after another deputy reported he was fired on when he tried to stop a four-wheel drive truck bearing a dealer tag for a license check. The occupants of the truck then reportedly fled into the woods.

A Sheriff's spokesman said a posse of about 100 officers tracked two men to the Mississippi-Alabama line, cornering one in a house while the other fled bleeding into the woods. The spokesman said the dead assailant's body was found by the posse. The second man was caught when he tried to flee. He is charged with first-degree murder, assault on an officer in the performance of his duty, illegal possession of two sawed-off shotguns, and possession of marijuana.

Politicians malign their opponents with false rumors and praise themselves for their virtues and expectations.

I ask:

For, if the opponent is so unethical, why is he not in the custody of the law? And praise comes from others and not of oneself. And a public spoken expectation is a promise, a trail of promises, broken. Are these the leaders of our country?

The President and the "City Mayors" cry that we must cut spending, to balance the budgets.

And they are right, for to run a country and a city, the books must be balanced.

But I question the very way the books are being balanced.

For when the point is reached where our nation balances its debts, it will be a poorer nation, a poorer people.

When a business falls into debt and wants to remain in business, it cuts spending, sells its inventory, and takes a loss. Then it trief to re-group, find the mistake, make a profit, and rebuild its inventory. If this happens too often, the result is a business failure.

Our United States is now in the throe of cutting spending and reducing its inventory to balance our frightening financial situation. Our reduced inventory is putting a terrible burden on our people.

Yet if we pass the crises and do survive, our nation will be the poorer. It will take many good deals, and many good years, to again build up our national inventories.

And then it could happen again!

Why could it happen again? Why do we have this drain on our nation? Where has your money gone? What bad deal has been made? Why is this nation falling? What has upset the balances?

Has America ever supported monopolies? But the giant corporations seem to be eating up the smaller ones. The money is getting in the hands of a few. When people hunger they do not care for exact definitions of the word monopoly. They, in a country of some billion people, do not care if 1 or 500 make up a monopoly. In a population expanded country must not the definition of corporate monopolization be changed?

The monopolies are people of power who buy good materials or services in huge quantities to get the best prices. They play the monopoly game by reducing the price, eating up the small competition, and then increasing the price. When the price is increased, some new competitors enter, but by the almost everyone concerned already flushed. The young new competitors keep the government off the monopolies back while the power controls the market. If enough new competitors enter, they play the same deal and start all over again.

Whether or not we the people come out of it or go bankrupt is a thread-bare sword that lingers over us all. It is of no concern to the monopoly player!

The money is getting into the hands of fewer and fewer people. Money becomes power, a power over us all.

And money in the hands of non-compassionate power-seeking men becomes a malignancy.

When money gets in the hands of too few people, deplorable is he that controls it and is not charitable – deplorable is he that controls it and is not benevolent – deplorable is he that controls it and is not compassionate. Where are the good men?

When too few people control money for power alone, that is the point where the tide reverses. For a new power takes hold. It is the power of the belly and the power of the mind.

After you soft soap and deceive people long enough, they eventually find out the secret. When their bellies and minds hunger, words without consequence no longer suffice. They know where it's at.

POINTS OF VIEW

The Milkman

The milkman informed me that he pays a higher wholesale price for milk than the supermarkets sell it for. This is because this week the supermarket decided that they would use the milk to draw in new customers and not make any money on it. I also assume they know that the public is getting enraged at the price of such a basic food, for the price of milk is high enough.

This week it's cut-rate milk, and next week it's cut-rate sugar, and next week it's cut-rate beans.

The latest gimmick today is to have a give-away and make it up on the other merchandise. Soon everyone will be partaking in this game. Camera stores will be giving away cameras and profiting on accessories.

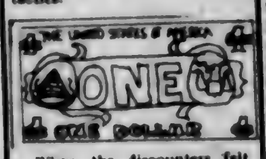
And when the milkman learns of the game he will be offering butter at wholesale and making it up on everything else.

Our Forefathers

When our forefathers built this nation and the people were taxed, did not the people expect a return for their money? Did the people fight a revolution to be hoodwinked by their own people? Did they not put the money in the hands of honorable people who would use it to prosper the nation? I hear the roar of chuckles at my naiveties. But is that not why we the people fought this revolution? To what place in time have we come?

A Money Game

The discounter made money by selling in volume and selling at a lower price. The small store keepers, after 10 years, finally realized that the population had increased. They started to use the discounters' tactics.



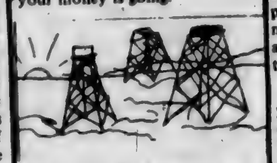
When the discounters felt the pressure, they decided to use "the shoddy merchandise routine." Merchandise no longer lasted as long.

Now the latest gimmick is to give something away at cost as a draw for public attention and still sell the shoddy stuff. So the discounter bombs out its own kind and everyone else along with them. You make up these money games that everyone catches up with sooner or later.

WHERE IS YOUR MONEY GOING – A DIFFERENT "VIEWPOINT"

A Tale from the Arabian Nights

Hop aboard the magic carpet and soar 5,000 miles above the earth. Take out the Genie's see all eyeglasses and see where your money is going.



I see a man and an oil well. The man is taking in billions of dollars for his oil. The man who owns these oil wells lives exceedingly well. It looks kind of nice.

But look, this man of exceeding wealth, who lives so beautifully that he has enough money for many future generations is now doubling the price for his oil. Why?

He does not need money. Why is he doing this thing? He is doing this thing to exert power!

Ah – then he must be becoming a great man. For in this age only truly great men can handle power and money. He will take this money to build great things for humanity. For it is humanity from which he is now sowing.

What is the crux or the crud of the matter?

I see power; I see money; and I see no compassion. All I see are commercials that the man of oil makes. His deeds are but a handful of sand on the Arabian desert. Another fairy tale.

Back to the Money Game

And the oil men set the price!

And the oil men set the price for the bankers and for the landlords and for big business and down the line, etc, etc, etc, until it comes to your turn. But for some strange reason you the people are not getting the increase that is due you.

Now let's see what happened.

The oil men sought power without benevolence.

What did the bankers do? What did the landlords do? What did big business do? Did they not fall prey to the oil men? Didn't they unwittingly become the Henchmen of the oil men? Do they not unwittingly also now deal with power and no benevolence, with power and no compassion?

And the buck is passed right down the line until it comes to you. You who are the great masses of America.

And YOU the people and we the people, who are we supposed to pass the buck to?

If we pass the buck down to the poor, they become desperate men who breed revolution. If we pass the buck to the poor, we also become people of no benevolence. We become the little pockets of power without compassion.

Will we the people play this new money game?

If we do not play the new money game, but use our energies to rebuild America, what then? Will we build and build and build, only to let the people of power and non-compassion do it to us again? For they can do it any time they wish.

If we spent the next 20 years rebuilding and develop our own fuel resources, what is to prevent another Mr. X turning the world towards chaos? Why should we build a nation to have it snapped from our grasp? Why are we not stopping the evil at its source? Why do we not ask its unaware henchmen questions?

The money is going from the people because this is where the squeeze takes place. It takes place with the people who are in contact with the rest of the people's needs. It takes place with the people who see their surroundings and with the people who are the benevolent ones. It takes place with the people who want to help, who try to help, but the more they try, the more they get kicked.

And when they get kicked, they have to choose to become a more poor but nice guy or to hold their own and be a bastard.

Well, I say compassion starts at the top.

We have travelled 5,000 years from Moses, and 2,000 years from Jesus. Did they die in vain? I am not talking religion. I am talking about good people, good leaders.

Leaders of learning
Leaders of understanding
Leaders of compassion

Leaders of knowledge
Leaders not of the word, but of the deed. Leaders of the people! For it is of, by, and for the people that we lead.

World Food Crisis Continues

The world's food crisis continues. Some 460,000 people -- one in eight – suffer from severe chronic malnutrition. Food prices soar. Meanwhile the typical American diet, with its preponderance of sugar and saturated fats, is implicated in half of all deaths in the United States.

Does that mean nothing to you? Well, think about it this way:

Do you know why food prices keep going up, even when farm prices go down?

Do you know who makes the food you eat, or what those "fine print" ingredients in it do?

Do you know that sugars and fats--the prime suspects in the national epidemic of obesity, heart disease, and bowel cancer--constitutes sixty per cent of the American diet?

Or that every single day, the Defense Department spends a sum roughly equal to the U.N.'s food-related budget for an entire year?

It sounds serious. It is. Americans are eating themselves sick while much of the world starves. And more and more, we can't even find fresh wholesome foods at reasonable prices. Instead, we swallow a hodgepodge of foods, additives and ripoffs dished out by grocery chains and agribusiness. It is time for citizens to start winning back control of our food supply. Food Day, April 8, 1976, will be that time.

Food Day, sponsored by the non-profit Center for Science in the Public Interest, is a national day of action on the food crisis. Last year colleges and universities celebrated the first Food Day all across the country. Students and faculty held teach-ins, workshops and debates, planted community gardens, fasted, raised money, and thought about food. This year we will build on those first consciousness-raising efforts. Our goal for 1976 is to convey a deeper understanding of the problems, and to achieve concrete policy changes. While Food Day will still encompass all aspects of hunger, nutrition and agribusiness, we will put special emphasis on food policies at the state, community, and campus level. There's a lot to do right where you are.

Start a course on the politics of food, if your school doesn't already have one. Use Food for People, Not for Profit (Ballantine Books), the Food Day handbook, as a text.

Ban junk foods from school vending machines. Replace them with apples and pears, yogurt, unsalted nuts, and granola.

Encourage your city or town--or your school--to provide idle land to would-be urban gardeners. Community gardens already flourish in Jackson, Mississippi; Syracuse, New York; downtown Sacramento, California; and 100 other cities. Think big: Consider setting up coops or buying clubs, even farmers' markets, for your campus or town.

Efforts like these require a lot of time, energy and planning. Now is the time to start pulling together your Food Day committee, utilizing your school as a resource base for both campus and community-oriented activities. Concentrating on local policies, students can help bring concrete changes to the way this country raises, markets, and consumes its food.

Contact the national Food Day office to help set up activities at your school. Write for organizing ideas and suggestions for activities to Food Day, Washington, D.C. 20036.

WHY LIVE A LIFE WITHOUT MEANING?

Too many of us are in places we don't want to be. Doing things we really don't want to be doing. Sometimes, it's because we can't think of anything better to do--but that's no way to live.

Since you have only one life to live, you might as well live it with joy . . . with a feeling of satisfaction and accomplishment . . . and the knowledge that you are giving, not taking. Why not decide to live for the best . . . for a great purpose . . . for something bigger than you are?

If you want to change the direction of your life, you might investigate the Paulist way of living. The Paulists are a small group of Catholic priests dedicated to preaching the Gospel of Christ to the American people. For over 100 years the Paulists have done this through the communication arts—books, publications, television and radio—on college campuses, in parishes, in missions in the U.S., in downtown centers, in working with young and old. Because we are flexible, we continually pioneer new approaches. To do this we need dedicated, innovative men to carry on our work.

To find out what road God has chosen us to walk is one of the most important tasks of our life.

Which road will be yours?

Turkey Day Tourney Disastrous For Icecats

To say the North Country Thanksgiving Hockey Festival was disappointing would be an understatement. The University of Vermont Hockey Team traveled to St. Lawrence University over the holiday and came home empty handed in three games at Canton, New York.

St. Lawrence Wins 8–4

In the tourney opener, the Larries took advantage of numerous Vermont penalties and built up a 4-0 first period lead and held on to whip the Catamounts 8–4. Forced to make several line changes due to the loss of Bill Reber and Ben Lord to the flu, the Cats were a bit disoriented throughout the game and could never quite get untracked. The horrendous first period made Vermont play catch up hockey, which is never easy. Also, a number of defensive and offensive lapses hurt the Cats considerably.

Kevin Campbell started the scoring for the Larries when he connected on a slapshot from the left point. It was the first of four St. Lawrence power play goals. Tom Faludi got the first of his three goals when Dan Weir broke up a Catamount play behind the UVM net and sent the puck to Faludi out in front of McNamara. Faludi then shoved the puck underneath the defenseless McNamara.

After two more Larrie goals, Vermont got on the scoreboard with less than a minute to play in the first stanza. Benoit Rocheleau slipped the puck to Michel Lebeau behind the Larry net. Lebeau skated out to the left of net-minder Harry Aikens and slipped a back hander that went off Aikens' skates and into the net.

St. Lawrence got their fifth goal early in the second period on another powerplay goal to make it 5–1. The Cats seemed to come alive midway through the period when Tim O'Connell connected for his fifth goals of the season after a faceoff. Vermont continued to dominate and got their third goal when Michel Lebeau picked up a rebound and lifted it over the sprawled Aikens. Ed Hill hit the post and Rocheleau lost the puck with an open net to shoot at. Randy Koch then picked up a misconduct penalty and the air was deflated from the Vermont balloon.

Both squads exchanged goals in the third period, with Paul Gallagher scoring for St. Lawrence and Andy Halford taking on a pretty backhand pass from Lebeau. The Larries picked up two more goals to take complete control and Vermont left the ice, victims of an 8–4 loss.

One of the few bright spots for the Cats was work of Michel Lebeau, who picked up two goals and an assist in the Cats third loss of the year.

UVM Falls To Clarkson

UVM, looking for its first win of the season, went up against a well-prepared Clarkson University squad and for the fourth time the Cats dropped a 3–1 decision to the Golden Knights.

Once again Michel Lebeau led the charge, as the hard skating forward tallied the first goal of the game. The Quebec native took a pass from Benoit Rocheleau, darted around two Clarkson defenders and unloaded on netminder Brian Shields. The shot bounced back directly in front of the cage and Lebeau's second effort lit the light. Lebeau's third goal of the tourney appeared to be just what the doctor ordered for the weary Catamounts.

Clarkson knotted the score at the 13:22 mark on a power play goal. A knight shot bounced off a Catamount's skates and Craig Laupelle picked it up and drilled the puck into the Vermont net beyond the outstretched reach of Peter Reynolds.

Less than 30 seconds later, Kevin Zappia controlled another loose puck in front of the Vermont net, and, although Reynolds stopped the first shot, he could not recover in time to get the rebound. Poor play in front of the net had turned a 1–0 Vermont lead into a 2–1 advantage for Clarkson.

Neither team could find the range in the middle stanza, but an outstanding effort by Reynolds kept the Cats close. Reynolds denied two Clarkson breakaways and made several other remarkable stops as the junior tallied 30 saves for the day.

Lebeau led in an early third period charge, but Vermont couldn't get by Shields. Clarkson then put the game out of reach at the 15:05 mark when Marty McNally broke in on Reynolds all alone. The UVM goalie kicked out his first shot but McNally knocked in the rebound to salt away the 3–1 Clarkson win.

Concordia Knocks Off Cats

At St. Lawrence's Appleton Arena, it was a battle of the goaltenders Saturday night as Concordia's Jim Corsi outduelled Vermont's Tom McNamara in the 5–2 win for the Concordia Stingers.

Concordia bombed the UVM netminder with 49 shots with McNamara making 44 saves, while Corsi stopped 25 of 27 Vermont shots.

The Stingers moved out to a quick 3-0 lead on UVM defensive mistakes. Only 1:44 into the game, Ron Hansis scored to give Concordia a 1–0 lead. McNamara made the initial stop but the puck came out front, and when the UVM defense failed to clear the puck, Hansis put it home. Two Vermont defenders collided and left a clear shot for Mark Shawchuck who surprised McNamara. Late in the period Claude Campeau got credit for a goal when the puck glanced off a skate to McNamara's left and went into the net.

The Cats got moving in the second period when Bill Spence connected from Joe Ostin and Tim O'Connell. The puck was shoved to Spence, who was standing to Corsi's left. Bill whirled and slammed the puck past the goaltender to cut the lead to 3–1.

Both netminders continued to deny their opponents, but early in the third period, John Glynne let loose a terrific slapshot that went between Corsi's pads to make it 3–2.

Gaetan Potvin got the fourth Concordia goal when he fired the puck past the outstretched leg of McNamara. The Stingers fifth goal came on an empty net.

Tom McNamara was outstanding for Vermont, but the law of averages was against him. There were just too many mistakes and shots for him to stop. Corsi made the saves he had to make and did an excellent job for Concordia.

The loss left Vermont 0-5, with twin losses to St. Louis and losses to St. Lawrence and Clarkson. The Cats are undoubtedly looking forward to playing before the home crowd in hopes of quickly turning the season around. On paper, the Catamounts are strong. But they don't play on paper so they'll have to go out and prove their strength on ice. This year, like last, has been slow starting for the Icecats and one can only hope for a turnaround equal to or better than last year's.

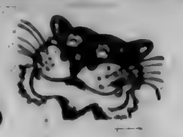
Charlie's Red Hots



by Jeff Twiss

First of all, welcome back from vacation. This year, I'll be trying to keep abreast of what is occurring in the Division I Hockey scene, while Randy Briggs will be keeping abreast of the basketball world.

Over vacation, Concordia won the North Country Tournament, as they beat Clarkson 5-1, St. Lawrence 6-2, and our Cats 5-2. In the Utica Tournament, powerful UNH, our Division I neighboring foe, easily won by clobbering Pennsylvania 13-5 and edging Colgate 4-3. Also, Northeastern 6, Yale 4; Dartmouth 8, Princeton 7 in OT; St. Louis 4, Boston College 2; and the U.S. Olympic team split, beating R.P.I. 9-3 and losing to the tough Big Red of Cornell 6-4; BU 5, Providence 3; and Cornell 3, UNH 2.

This year there are two hockey polls that have been established:

ECAC Division I Coaches Poll: (1) BU; (2) Harvard; (3) Cornell; (4) UVM; (5) UNH; (6) Brown; (7) Providence; (8) B.C.; (9) Clarkson; (10) St. Lawrence; (11) R.P.I.; (12) Northeastern; (13) Penn.; (14) Princeton; (15) Colgate; (16) Dartmouth; (17) Yale.

Boston Globe Poll (by Sports Editor Joe Concannon): (1) B.U.; (2) Cornell; (3) UVM; (4) UNH; (5) Brown; (6) Harvard; (7) Providence; (8) B.C.

Coaches of leading teams are: Dick Butrond – Cornell; Jim Cross – UVM; Charlie Hold – UNH; Jack Parker – B.U.

Free Style and Ski Racing

The first kind of Freestyle competition I ever heard of was what they do in the last leg of a medley swimming relay. They call it Freestyle because you can use any stroke you want, and the fastest time wins. Ski racing is actually this sort of Freestyle competition too.

In a ski race you can ski any style you want. You are completely free to use your imagination to get down however you can. The only thing that counts is going through all the gates and getting down the fastest. Anyone who has seen any races will confess to the multitude of styles that can be witnessed.

Some of you are thinking, "Sure, sure, but you don't see any stunts watching a ski race." I've seen a lot of skiing and the best stunts I've seen anywhere were in ski races.

One year at the Roche Cup Downhill at Aspens, for example, I saw a racer do three quarters of a back flip with half a twist at better than sixty miles per hour. That's an exciting stunt in anybody's book.

As you all know the 1975-1976 College Basketball season is underway. In order to keep all the fans up to date in what is happening in the regional basketball scene, I will have a weekly column recapping the scores, developments and Yankee Conference standings. Of course my main focus will be on the Catamount Hoopsters who have already begun their season.

What I would like to do in this first week is give a brief preview of the Yankee Conference Race. With most teams returning with their top players, this shapes up to be the most competitive the conference has been in many years.

Massachusetts again will be strong despite losing three top players from last year's squad. But head coach Jack Leaman always seems to find the talent. Top returnee Jim Town is a junior and will attempt to lead a predominantly sophomore and freshman team. The Minutemen will be hard pressed to win their fourth straight conference title.

The Connecticut Huskies will again be a very strong team. Top returning players are Tony Hanson, Lee Otis Wilson and Al Weston. These three combined averaged 43 points a game. The question mark with this team will be whether its bench can compliment the fine starting five.

The Rhode Island Rams have their five starters from last year back. Guard Jim Williamson who averaged 15 points a game is top scorer. They also have size with 6-9 Randy Wilds and 6-8 Vic Soares. It appears that better days are ahead for coach Jack Kraft.

Boston University returns seven lettermen. Leading scorer Neil Burns who averaged 16.0 points a game and 6-7 Curtis Vanlandingham are the Terriers top players. They will be tough because of their excellent speed and quickness.

The New Hampshire Wildcats have nine returning lettermen and could challenge for the top spot. Senior guard Wayne Morrison is their top player. He passed the 1,000 career point mark last season. This team could surprise many people.

The University of Maine boasts the top player in the conference in the opinion of this writer. That player is 6-6 forward Bob Warner. He was the nation's second leading rebounder pulling down fourteen a game, on top of that he was New England's second leading scorer with a 19.7 average. Steve Gavett also returns at center. This team will also be tough.

Yugoslavian Stars Hold Off Charge To Win 95-88

by Randy Briggs

A week ago last Sunday night at the Patrick Gymnasium, the touring Lokomotiva Basketball Team from Zayreb, Yugoslavia held off a gallant second half rally by the University of Vermont Basketball Team to defeat the Catamounts 95-88.

Vermont came out shooting as they missed their first three shots, but got on the board to knot the score at two when Charlie Trapani scored on a spinning jumper. Although the Cats did not shoot well early, they were working the ball around well in an attempt to get everybody in the offense. The Lokomotiva team shot very well in opening portions of the game mainly because they were getting second and third chances on their shots. The Vermont defense also broke down and allowed the Yugoslavian team to get many easy fast break baskets.

The Cats opened up with a man to man defense. It did not seem to work well until the second half when they applied a full court man to man press. Only the fine outside shooting by Warren Prehmus and Ron Gottschalk kept Vermont close in the opening portions of the first half. About Midway through the first half the Cats employed a halfcourt man to man press. This did not bother the Lokomotiva team as they continued to get many easy layups.

The Yugoslavians held the lead most of the first half with their biggest margin being nine points on one occasion. When it appeared that the Yugoslavs were going to build up an even bigger lead, 6-4 freshman Earl Knight came off the bench to pump in 7 points in 6 minutes. This allowed the Cats to trail at the half by only 6 points 49-43. Vermont shot 44% in the first half while Lokomotiva connected on 53% of their shots.

The Cats appeared to be somewhat confused and disorganized in the first half. Obviously, this can be contributed to the fact that it was Vermont's first game, and it does take some time before plays can be executed with timing and precision. Vermont could not contend with Lokomotiva's captain and guard Nikola Plecas. He opened up many good scoring chances with fine playmaking. He also had 14 first half points.

The way the second half started, it appeared that Lokomotiva would win easily. They scored on a layup off the opening jump. Then Plecas stole the ball and scored. After Vermont came down the floor and missed a shot, the Yugoslavs came right back with Plecas hitting on a jumper off the glass. Only the efforts of Ron Gottschack kept the game from getting completely out of reach for Vermont. He hit two free throws and scored on two follow up shots to keep Vermont within striking distance.

The Yugoslavs pin point passing, resulting in easy layups, continued to burn Vermont. The Cats also committed a few costly turnovers but continued to battle and never gave up. With around eleven and a half minutes left in the game the Lokomotivans still held a fairly secure 13 point lead 71-58. It was at this point in the contest that Vermont went to its full court man to man press which caused the Yugoslavs to turn the ball over many times, 6-11. Mike Kern made his initial debut a successful one as the Cats ran off 11 straight points to close within 2. Kern pumped in 5 points in this stretch which caused the crowd to come alive. Greg Davis also electrified the crowd during this stretch with his unbelievable ball handling in many crucial instances. Ron Gottschalk's tough rebounding made the Slavs realize that they were not going to have things all their way underneath the hoop.

With 9 minutes left the score stood at 71-69 in favor of the Yugoslavs. It appeared that the Cats had everything going for them. But continued Vermont defensive lapses enabled the Lokomotiva team to maintain a 2 to 4 point edge for the next 2 or 3 minutes. The Cats were also getting beaten badly off their offensive boards. With only one shot at the basket Vermont had a difficult time catching the Yugoslavians and taking the lead. Only red hot shooting by Mark Sobelewski kept the Cats close.

But the Cat's constant pressure kept them in the game right down to the final minute. With a minute and 50 seconds to go, Charlie Trapani knotted the score at 86-86. Thirty seconds later Zvonwko Aversek converted on a driving layup to put Lokomotiva ahead for good. Vermont still had an excellent chance at this point, but a missed layup and a couple of off balance shots that didn't fall sealed their fate.

In the final analysis of the contest, the game may have been won at the free throw line. The Yugoslavs made 27 of 32 attempts while the Cats hit on only 16 of 23. In this writer's opinion, good defense is the key to any victory. Vermont did not play good defense. They played fairly well offensively but made a few costly mistakes in crucial situations. The Cats were also very hesitant on their shot selection, often passing up open shots in order to get closer shots.

In respect to the Locomotiva team, it was obvious that they play a very physical brand of basketball. They like to clear the ball off the boards and run. It was this style that led to all the easy layups. They are very quick for their size and they drive to the basket extremely well. They also showed fine shooting touch around the basket. Vermont's full court press did seem to bother them because they are not usually accustomed to this tactic.

High scoring honors were shared by Warren Prehmus and Locomotiva guard Nikola Plecas with 22 points each. Zivko Ljubojevic chipped in 21 points for the Zagreb-based team. I was very impressed with the performances of freshmen Earl Knight, Mike Kern, Greg Davis, and Tom Perrin. I am sure as the season progresses these players will become a very integral part of the team's success.

Locomotiva ended up shooting 53% for the game while Vermont shot 42%.

Women's Gymnastics Enjoys Opener

by Kimberly Honza

The UVM Women's Gymnastic Team travelled to Green Mountain College on November 22, where they met with tough competition, not only from host Green Mountain, but also Castleton State and New York University of Albany.

The competition itself was divided into two categories. The beginning division, which involved routines not containing moves of high difficulty, and the intermediate division. UVM took both divisions, scoring 30.10 in beginning, followed by Albany with 29.01 and Castleton with 16.25. In the intermediate division, UVM took first with 52.25. Once again Albany took second with 48.82 and Castleton third with 43.40.

In the beginning division, Jeannette Prince took first in the balance beam competition with a score of 3.85. Teammate Sue Makris followed third with 3.05. Scoring 3.2, and placing 2nd in the uneven parallel bar competition was freshman B.J. Frey. In vaulting, Carol Chesley's point total of 6.4 got a third, and in the floor exercises, Nancy Cicino placed 5th.

At the intermediate level, Janet Lynch and Anne Berry seemed to play a principle part in UVM's winning effort. In the balance beam competition, Janet Lynch placed first with 6.15 points, and Karen Eskilsen was second with 4.8. Second in the uneven parallel bar event was Anne Berry with 7.10, followed closely with 7.10 points from third place Sue Makris. Anne Berry and Janet Lynch were both place finishers in the vaulting competition. 7.9 points won the event for Miss Berry, while 6.45 points got a 4th place tie for Miss Lynch. Janet Lynch completed her scoring by placing second in floor exercises with a point total of 7.1.

The next showing of the women's gymnastics squad, will be a home competition on December 4 at 4 p.m. against Plymouth.

Alumni Game Great Fun

by Norm Robinson

Prior to the Yugoslavian game a week ago last Sunday, UVM basketball alumni met for a fun filled, yet serious game. The even years, dressed in green, met the odd years, who were in white, and behind balanced scoring, the Even Years defeated the Odd, 83-72.

Greg Ashford led the Even team with 16 points, while Terry Green, Frank Giordano, and Bruce Fields poured in 14, 13 and 10 respectively.

It was an interesting example of some of the changes in basketball style. The style of the forties, the set shot, was very much in evidence. On the other hand Joe Greco, Terry Green and others displayed the running jumpshot.

Although beaten by 11 points the white team had some fine individual performances from Greco, with 18 points, and George Peredy with 15. Mike "Downtown" Brown hit on a couple of long shots and excited the crowd with some dazzling ball handling.

The teams played eight minutes periods in the first half, but it was increased to 12 in the second due to the "superior condition of the alumni."

It was an enjoyable evening for all involved, but the crowd roared when Bob Carlson hit on a long two-hand setshot late in the game after several near-misses.

Norm Strassburg "coached" the odd years while Athletic Director Dennis Lambert led the winning Even years.

Dartmouth Wins In Overtime

by Rita Bruce

Dartmouth College scored a thrilling victory over the University of Vermont at the Gutterson Fieldhouse Monday evening. The score was 7 to 6 in overtime. Mark Culhane scored the winning goal with 4 minutes, 3 seconds left in the sudden death overtime period.

The Catamounts started off the scoring with two quick goals early in the first period. A power play goal by captain Tim O'Connell and a goal from left wing Michel Lebeau gave Vermont an early 2 to 0 lead. Later in the period, however, the Big Green took advantage of a Vermont penalty and scored their first goal of the evening. Dan Leigh scored Dartmouth's goal with center Tom Fleming assisting. While Vermont was short-handed again, Dartmouth tied up the score with a goal from Culhane with defensemen Chris Hodgson and Bob Grant helping out. Then, with just 1:28 left in the first period, freshman wing Rick Racic got the puck past UVM goalie Pete Reynolds to give Dartmouth a 3 to 2 lead.

At the beginning of the second period Dartmouth started up where they left off by scoring their fourth goal of the evening. However, because of excellent defense by both teams this was the only goal scored in the entire second period.

In the final period Vermont came out strong. With 4:25 gone in the period Vermont's O'Connell scored his second goal of the game. Freshman defenseman Joe Odin assisted to make the score 4 to 3, in favor of Dartmouth. Less than a minute later Andy Halford tied the score at four goals each. The tie score was broken at 7:05 of the third period on a goal from Dartmouth's Scott Coleman. Junior Bill Spence tied the score again at 5-5 on a shot past Dartmouth goalie Jeff Sollows. With only twenty seconds left to play in regulation time, the Big Green scored what seemed to be the winning goal. Culhane made the score with defenseman John Hugo assisting him.

With the score 6 to 5 in favor of Dartmouth the game seemed to be over and Dartmouth the victors, but with nine seconds remaining, Halford scored his second goal of the evening. The packed Fieldhouse crowd went wild as Vermont and Dartmouth went into overtime.

An excited crowd was hushed at 5:57 of the overtime period when Culhane scored his third goal of the game. Having to choose stars of the game would be a difficult task. The Catamounts put on a fine team performance in a losing effort. Mark Culhane was the outstanding player for the Big Green with three goals, one of them the winning goal. It was one of the most exciting games that fans have viewed at Vermont, although they were disappointed at the end.

The Catamounts, still looking for their first victory of the season, travel to Canton, New York Saturday to play St. Lawrence. Then they come back home and play Norwich Dec. 11th and Clarkson Dec. 12th.

The Alpine Events, (Slalom and Giant Slalom) will be held at Smugglers Notch Friday and Saturday mornings. The Cross

Cubit Leads Cats over Northeastern

The University of Vermont basketball team opened their season on the proper note Saturday evening as they exploded in the second half to convincingly beat back the Northeastern Huskies by a 72-54 score.

The Catamounts held a slim 31-30 lead at the half and actually trailed 42-41 at one point, but sophomore guard Mark Cubit poured in 12 of his team's leading 16 points in the next few minutes to lead the attack. With Ron Gottschalk and 6-8 Kevin Kelly dominating the boards, and Mark Sobelewski and Greg Davis shutting down the Huskie's guards, Vermont totally controlled the latter part of the game.

The game was a rough, physical game as the first four minutes showed. Only six points were scored in the span while five personal fouls were called.

With about five minutes left in the half, the Catamounts pulled out to a nine point lead, led by the rebounding of the flu-ridden Ron Gottschalk. Things were looking good for Vermont, but some poor shots by UVM and the boardwork of the Huskies cut the lead.

Led by All-New England candidate John Clark, Northeastern tallied 12 unanswered points to take a 30-27 lead. Cubit and freshman Earl Knight scored for Vermont to give them a slim 31-30 lead at the half.

The Cats could manage only an icy 38 per cent from the floor, but tough rebounding and poor shooting by the Huskies as well kept the game close.

As the second half started, Northeastern pulled out to a 38-35 lead, and Vermont hurt themselves offensively by missing some "gimmes". Finally the Cats started moving on offense when Warren Prehmus, who was neutralized in the early going, knocked in six straight points. After lead 42-41, UVM pulled away to their convincing victory.

Vermont played solid defense throughout the drive, with Kevin Kelly pulling down 10 rebounds to aid the Cat pull away. Although weakened by the flu both Gottschalk and Kelly dominated the boards and stopped 6-8 center Keith Motley from doing much damage.

It was an important victory for UVM, because it gets their momentum moving in the right direction for future games this week. After Wednesday's game with UNH, the Cats go to Maine to meet Bob Warner and company in two very tough games.

Defense was the name of the game for Vermont, as it will be all season, while the many freshmen worked into the system as well. Sam Copeland, Earl Knight, and Greg Davis all looked good for Vermont. The Catamounts next home game is Tuesday night against St. Mike's.

The women's gymnastics team won their season's opener while at Green Mountain College. Taking both the beginning and intermediate divisions, they finished well ahead of SUNY at Albany, Castleton State, and Green Mountain. Outstanding performances were made by Jeannette Prince, placing first in the balance beam, beginner division; and Anne Berry and Janet Lynch, making up the principle scoring in the intermediate division.

The Volleyball team travelled to Keene State to meet with the home team and Castleton State. The "A" team was successful, in that they defeated a tough Keene State team 2-1, with the game scores 13-15, 15-9, 15-3. They also downed the Castleton "A" team by the same set score 2-1. The game scores were 15-2, 7-5, 15-1. The team set up plays well, with their pass-set-spike play, proving to be Castleton's downfall. Julie Cahow serving brought in 12 of the 15 points in the first set while Belinda Emerson had 7 of the 15 points on her service in the last set. The "A" team finished the season with a 7-3 record. The "B" team also enjoyed the outing, defeating Castleton State 2-0, but losing to Keene 0-2. They close their season this weekend in an invitational at Castleton State.

Textbook Exchange

Recently the General Assembly of the Student Association gave its approval to the institution of a used textbook exchange where students would be able to exchange textbooks at a price more advantageous to both the seller and the buyer than the bookstore is able to provide.

There will be billboards divided into appropriate departments and course levels set up at the beginning of each semester in Billings North Lounge. Anyone who wants to sell a book can fill out a card with such pertinent information as where the seller can be reached, the name of the book, its price and condition. The card will be placed on the board under the appropriate course where a student wishing to buy the book can get the necessary information and contact the seller.

The design of this system was taken from a working system at University of Maine at Orono. We hope that this important service will work at U.V.M. The billboards will be in Billings North Lounge in January.

Phi Beta Kappa

The University of Vermont's Alpha Chapter of Phi Beta Kappa, the national scholastic honors society, initiated seven new members this month including one who received his degree last May.

They are, from Burlington, Michael V. Berry, Class of 1975, and Juliet M. DeLarichelliere; from St. Albans, Daniel E. Tulip; from Winooski, Susan G. Abbott.

Also, from Shutesbury, Mass., Virginia H. Randall; from Concord, N.H., Elisabeth P. Hyde; and from Port Washington, N.Y., John H. Lunde.

The Vermont Alpha Chapter was established at the University in 1848 and later became the first local chapter in the nation to initiate women into membership.

Year For Action

Applications are still being accepted for January placement in the University Year for Action program. Anyone who is interested in participating in this unique service/learning program is encouraged to contact the Office of Volunteer Programs now. We are located in Mansfield House and our telephone number is 656-2062.

Photo Display

PhotoGarden presents "His and Hers", a show of photographs by Gene and Faye Coley, until December 20.

PhotoGarden is located at 115 S. Winooski Ave., on the corner of College Street.

E. T. V. Interns

Applications are invited in a new internship program created by the nation's public television stations and the Ford Foundation to assist talented people seeking to begin careers in public broadcasting. Four scholarships, including a six-to nine-month living allowance, are offered: one in production at KCET Los Angeles; one in broadcast journalism at WETA Washington, D.C.; one in management at WGBH Boston; and one in management at KQED San Francisco.

Applicants will be selected by a Ford Foundation committee after recommendations are made by station managers at local PBS affiliates. Interested persons in this area may call Vermont ETV at (802) 656-3311 by December 20.

Vermont Farm Film

The first statewide broadcast of Marc Levitt's "Warden Farm" occurs Sunday December 14 at 10:00 p.m. on Vermont ETV. Levitt, a young filmmaker working partly in New York and partly in Vermont, completed this colorful documentary about his Barnet neighbor Robert Warden last summer and has shown it to audiences around Caledonia County.

"Warden Farm" is a pleasant visit with a dairy farmer of 50 years' experience who inherited a family farm begun in 1780. Warden's wife and two sons share the work with him and appear in the film.

The film depicts a hard, but satisfying, routine on an ordinary farm like hundreds of others in Vermont.

Winter Festival

Several UVM groups are in the process of developing a two week Winter Festival, to be held February 15-18. This promises to be a period of fun for all UVM students. Among the sponsors of the festival are the Greek Coordinating Council, Inter-Residence Association, SA Films, Speakers Bureau, and Concert Bureau, and the Outing Club. There will be activities planned to incorporate all geographic sections of the campus and utilizing different times during the two week period. If any student or group is interested in helping plan or work for the Festival, please contact the Student Activities Office.

Library

INTERSESSION runs from Sunday, December 21, 1975, through Friday, January 23, 1976. During this time the Library will be open Monday through Friday from 8:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m. It will be closed on weekends, Christmas and New Year's Day.

Admissions Office

With the purpose of involving students more fully in the Admissions Office process, as well as to give prospective students the opportunity to talk with UVM undergraduates like yourself, a "Student Admissions Representative" Program was coordinated and has been in operation since the Fall semester 1974.

At the end of this term, a few of these positions will be vacated and we are therefore looking for some eligible candidates who would like to serve as Student Admissions Representatives for the upcoming Spring semester 1976.

Responsibilities and requirements would be as follows:

1. For approximately one hour weekly each Student Rep would either a) conduct informal personal interviews with prospective students, or b) conduct a campus tour.

2. Each Student Rep would be required to attend weekly or bi-weekly meetings and training sessions in order to learn more about the University and the admissions process.

If you are interested in becoming involved as a Student Admissions Representative, please call the Admissions Office (3370) and make an appointment to speak with either Carol Kenison or Sid Tamule before you leave for Christmas vacation.

Model United Nations

David H. Papell, of Columbia University, Secretary-General of the National Model United Nations, has announced that the University of Vermont has been selected to represent Canada at the forthcoming Model U.N. This is the second time Vermont will represent Canada. In the past, Vermont has represented Austria, the Maldives, Panama, and Portugal. Professor James S. Pacy of the Department of Political Science is the faculty advisor of the Vermont group. The Model U.N. takes place in New York City, April 13-18. In addition to playing the roles of delegations and thereby participating in the various issues which face the United Nations, collegiate participants receive briefings from the permanent mission of the country they are role-playing and also hear addresses from top U.N. officials and national representatives, including the Secretary-General, Kurt Waldheim. Anyone desirous of information on the Model U.N. can contact Professor Pacy at 203 Old Mill or x-3050.

Greeks Elect Officers

The Greek Coordinating Council has elected four new officers for next year. Stacy Waldbridge of Theta Chi is the new president. He will be in charge of running GCC meetings and coordinating the work of the various committees and officers of the GCC. Also, most of the contact between the Greeks, UVM and other organizations outside of the GCC is handled through the president. Jeff Thomas of Sigma Alpha Epsilon is the Vice President. Of course, he'll be working closely with the president, but is responsible for keeping up on what's going on in all of the committees.

Joan Trankenburg from Alpha Delta Pi will be the new secretary. She is responsible for maintaining the minutes of all meetings and carrying on correspondence within the Council. The new Treasurer is Lori Chandler in charge of recording all finances. The GCC budget runs on a fund raised by charging each Greek three dollars per semester.

The GCC has four committees to which chairmen are appointed. The community services committee handles GCC philanthropy work. Activities such as 'rent-a-Greek' and May Day benefit the United Fund.

All social activities among the sororities and fraternities are planned by a social committee. This represents a large portion of the GCC budget. There is a membership committee charged with increasing membership in all of the houses. They put on a Rush barbeque last September and are now working on Rush booklet containing information about each of the eighteen Greek houses.

Finally there is a communications committee which puts out a Greek newsletter every week. It also submits articles to the Cynic, as well as publicizing some Greek activities on radio and in the press.

She looked like every other co-ed – long, straight hair, a sweatshirt too big, and dungarees too small. And her story was a familiar one. Her friends teased her about being a virgin so she had tried "it." Now, tearful and fearful, she described her symptoms. Examination showed only body lice – easily curable. Her reaction spoke volumes: "It sure wasn't worth it – it was no fun at the time. I've been worried ever since – and all it did was give me a dose of crabs."

Ten years of listening to young women at a large Eastern university had made me aware of the sexual confusion of the children of a generation that either misunderstood or ignored sexuality and had little wisdom to pass on to its self-liberating children.

Urged on by a loud minority, many young people have accepted a pattern of sexual activity that has no valid support. Anticipating love and happiness, students rush for the new conformity without wondering where the old ideas came from or why they survived so long. The casual sexual relationships of today challenge patterns of living developed over centuries.

A basic flaw in this "new morality" is the assumption that male and female sexuality are the same. The simplicity of the male anatomy and its operation suggest that to a man, sex can be an activity apart from his whole being – a drive related to the organs themselves. In women, the complex internal organization correlated with her other hormonal systems, indicates a diffuse total role for her sexuality. Truly, "love is to man a thing apart – a woman's whole existence." The man is orgasm-oriented with a drive that ignores most other aspects of the relationship. Almost totally different is the woman engulfed in romanticism and trying to find and express her total feelings for her partner.

A study at a Midwestern school showed that 80% of the women who had intercourse hoped to marry their partner. Only 12% of the men had the same expectation.

The simplicity of the male anatomy and its operation suggest that to a man, sex can be an activity apart from his whole being – a drive related to the organs themselves. In women, the complex internal organization, correlated with her other hormonal systems, indicates a diffuse total role for her sexuality. Truly, "love is to a man a thing apart – a woman's whole existence." The man is orgasm-oriented with a drive that ignores most other aspects of the relationship. Almost totally different is the woman, engulfed in romanticism and trying to find and express her total feelings for her partner.

A study at a Midwestern school showed that 80% of the women who had intercourse hoped to marry their partner. Only 12% of the men had the same expectation.

Women tell us that the soft warm promises and the tender touches are delightful, but that the act itself usually leads to a "is that all there is/to it?" reaction. Today's co-ed is not oriented to the long period of adjustment that is based on nonphysical values.

Their differences are painfully apparent in the follow-through of the relationship. The most urgent of his needs is met and perhaps ensured. She knows now what "sex object" means, has all the worries related to the affair, and may be trapped in a relationship she cannot easily change.

Although social workers talk of the plight of the out-of-wedlock father, this is a myth and will be until men become pregnant. And there are no men in the "morning-after clinic." The man finds indulgence far easier than did previous generations – handier, cleaner, cheaper, and without ongoing commitment.

"Faithful at the moment" is a fraud as far as women are concerned. Women love only in depth and with commitment to the future. To be happy they must have trust in their partner–no casual affair that is coitus-centered gives this.

The "pill" increases rather than relieves the problems of premarital sexual relationships. The real harm lies in the bypass the pill creates as far as progressive emotional maturity is concerned. Interaction of values is skipped – the pill indulges tension in both, but the price is higher in the woman because her emotional and physical needs require longer to mature.

"Sex for kicks" isn't real – it resembles animal coitus and ignores a basic characteristic of humans – the need for love – the need to care and to be cared for. Sexuality, and its physical expression must be part of the whole personality. To develop these is a major life goal and needs a climate of patience, understanding and, most important, time.

Dr. Mary Calderone says it well: "No one knows what effect sex, precociously experienced, will have on the immature mind. Sex experience before confidentiality, empathy, and trust have been established can hinder and may destroy the possibility of a solid permanent relationship."

The "new morality" is a fad – it ignores history, it denies the physical and mental composition of human beings, it is intolerant, exploitative, and is oriented toward intercourse, not love. The unity and community that couples seek cannot be accomplished at the pelvic level.

One of our seniors said: "I've tried everything here. I've had sexual relations with 23 different girls and now that it's about over I have learned that this did not bring me happiness. My life will be different because of my experiences at this university."

Good for him! But has anyone heard from the 23 girls?

Saga Says Looks At Simpson

by Dr. Food

Why is Simpson going to be closed next semester?

There have been no major renovations or improvements made in the Simpson Dining Hall for almost 20 years. As a consequence, much of the kitchen equipment, including ovens, dishwashers, and stoves are old and faulty.

Unfortunately, commercial kitchen equipment means tricky business. As an example, one can't just buy a new stove, plug it in and begin cooking. To put in a new stove, new wiring has to be added. To put in new wiring, walls must be opened or replaced. To replace walls and make other major renovations, the building has to be closed.

What changes have been made to accommodate students at Wright?

Tables will be moved from Simpson to Wright to increase seating to 600. Longer service hours will also be initiated and serving will be from 4:30 to 6:30. Also, additional employees will be added to handle the extra food preparation and serving.

What major difficulties have been averted by a test week?

A test run was made from Dec 1 to Dec 7 to determine any adjustment problems at Wright. "Results have been so smooth. Students haven't been able to believe we're feeding in excess of 800 students per meal," stated Food Service Director Ron Beaulieu.

Simpson manager Wally Fulmer was also pleased with the week long test. "Everything ran smoothly," he said. "We found we have to be open at 4:30, but we don't need to stay open after 6:45."

"Between 6:30 and quarter of 7, we only fed 10 people," he said. "Every 15 minutes we took counts," Wally continued. "Between 500 and 600 ate before 5:30."

Wright manager Gary Jones said he experienced no problems. "We were able to clean up and open the Snack Bar at the regular 8:00 time," he said. A "face in the crowd" added that feeding 800 rather than 600 is nothing for the Boy Wonder.

"Wally Fulmer really enjoys Wright's extra crowds," a source close to the manager said. Extra heads mean more participants for the Weird Wally's Weekly Workshop Series. "Wally is weird: Weird Wally is Walter Fulmer," a source revealed.

Who is footing the renovation bill?

Money for the project is available from funds that all universities maintain as required under the Dept. of Housing and Urban Development. UVM's fund will comprise several hundred thousand dollars this year and the Simpson renovation is the major project. Last year's funds were spent for a major renovation of Converse and Redstone Halls, and other projects throughout the system.

The Exchange

by Julie A. Bushey '79
Counseling and Testing

The Exchange hopes that in the future the problems that are sent in, are more down to earth. We have received some problems and gripes that we can help people with, but ones such as "larger salad bowls at Living/Learning" are ones that you should look into yourself.

A Technical Nursing Freshman was quoted as saying, "It seems that whenever I want or need to study, the dorm is loud and noisy, making it impossible to absorb the material that I'm studying, and when I want to party, everyone is either studying or in a blah mood. If the quiet hours were strictly upheld, then studying would be much easier. I hope everyone reads this, and takes into consideration that while they are partying, others are trying to study or sleep."

It seems that your main problem is structuring your time for study and party. Try studying at different times and party only at times when your studying is done. If you feel like partying when no one else does, take a break and just relax. It may help suppress the urge and may motivate a new idea of something different to do.

On the food side of the week, "Why does Saga water down its soda? It appears to be a little ridiculous seeing as they are getting paid quite enough for it."

I really don't think Saga has much say as to what amount of soda and water comes out of their machines as it appears to be pre-bottled.

The Exchange is ready to go at answering any of the problems, gripes, complaints, praises, etc. that are put in the boxes. If you have a word to say, write it down and drop it in one of the boxes at Jeanne Mance, Billings, Converse, Hartis-Millis, Simpson or Wright, or call X2068.

Marines Driven Off Campus

(CPS)--Although the Marine Corps claim it's a rarity, recruiters have been driven from at least 11 college campuses since the beginning of last year's school year. The most recent incident at Trinity College in Hartford, CT resulted in the suspension of 14 students after a group interfered with recruiters on the campus.

About 40 of the school's 2000 students occupied the office that Marine recruiters were scheduled to appear in late in September to prevent them from recruiting on campus.

ABout half of the protesting students drifted out of the office when threatened with suspension by a Trinity administrator. Fourteen of the 20 remaining students were placed on temporary suspension by Trinity's dean, J. Ronald Spencer.

Spenser claimed that his action should "not be construed as a condonement or an endorsement of Marine or military recruitment on campus."

Demonstrators, however, said that the protest was organized partially to "expose the college's bogus position of academic neutrality." Organizers also said that they blocked the Marines' entrance because they felt the college should not give time and space to the United States "military machine." The Marines are "massively destructive of human life and world wide welfare," protesting students said.

Marine recruiters, as well as some Trinity students, were indignant later. A recruiter identified as Major Larkin by the student newspaper asked "What do they believe in? That the US should disarm? That we should stay off quality campuses?"

Larkin said that if the Marines were not allowed to recruit on "quality" campuses, the Marines would end up with lower quality officer recruits and become an "animal" force. The protesters, Larkin said, prevented him from talking to interested students and possibly attracting good recruits from the campus.

In a letter to the student newspaper one student called "suppression of opinion by a minority group." He said the group violated the rights of the Marines and other students by "assuming that their cause was so just that they had to protect the rest of us from exposure to the Marines."

At Marine recruiting headquarters in Washington, DC, Corporal Lawrence Mackay reported that while "the incident is not isolated, it is a rarity." Nine similar incidents occurred on campuses along the Northeast coast during the 74-75 school year. So far this year, Trinity College and Colgate University in New York are the only schools where Marine recruiters have been asked to leave the campus.

There are a number of other campuses that the Marines won't recruit on, Mackay said, but couldn't say which schools they were. They are institutions that forbid military recruiting or schools that local recruiters have found to

Potpourri From The Editor

After this issue, the Vermont Cynic will discontinue operations until after the vacation break in February. It has been a satisfying, educational, interesting, and intensive semester for the entire Cynic staff. Long and hard and often fun-filled hours were put into the publication of the Cynic. Our efforts were not in vain as readers' interest seems to be on the upswing, and we've received numerous compliments on this semester's Cynic. We thank our readers for their support and for giving us the morale boosters which was greatly appreciated.

However, most of these efforts were accomplished by a ridiculously small staff. Where student interest has increased in the Cynic, student participation has virtually disappeared. The Cynic staff has decreased to the point of the Editorial Board and a few dedicated writers and lay-out staff. Comprehensive coverage is not possible under these conditions, and on many occasions we were unable to fulfill our duties in covering the many events happening at UVM. If participation in the Cynic continues to decrease, it may be necessary to cease publications, as a limited staff would be unable to cope with the amount of work necessary to put out a good student newspaper. In the past, the Cynic was closed down for lack of funds. In the future, it may be student apathy that will cause the closure of the Cynic. The Cynic needs your participation in order to be a successful student newspaper, that will be a voice for the students, and an outlet for their opinions.

Everyone has worked diligently for the Vermont Cynic, and as a result we believe we have provided UVM with a fine paper. Everyone from the Editors and writers, to the lay-out staff put quite a bit of effort into the paper.

Beginning in February, a new Editorial Board will take over, under the new editor, Sue Perkins.

Finally, the Vermont Cynic staff wishes the University community a Merry Christmas, and a Happy Chanukah. May your New Year be filled with spirited beverages, a smile on your face, and content in your heart.

letters to the editor

Stop S.1

To the Editor:

S.1, called The Criminal Justice Reform Act of 1975, over 700 pages and now before the Senate, would among other things, do the following: Make investigative reporting of the kind that exposed Watergate all but impossible, and undercut the First Amendment, the bedrock of all our freedoms. Make peaceful protest legally hazardous, and punish people for mere acts of advocacy under the riot provisions. Encourage government invasion of privacy. Protect public servants from criminal penalties for any illegal act "required or authorized" in the performance of their duties.

S.1 is 90% an offspring of a 1973 Nixon Administration impetus. "The enactment of S.1 would constitute an unparalleled disaster for the system of individual rights in the United States," according to eminent legal authorities at Harvard and Yale Law Schools. It effects the freedom of all news media. The Washington Post staff writer, John P. MacKenzie cited sources who said the bill was virtually "unamendable." (front page Sept. 29)

We must stop S.1. It has too many defects to be amended without still threatening our civil liberties. Ask our Senators to help defeat this dangerous bill which would, in effect, if passed, make our country into a police state.

Thanks for Concern

To the Editor:

Too often good opportunities and services offered at the University of Vermont are overlooked. For this reason, I have decided to write this letter to help make others aware of one of the many services available. I am speaking of the Office of Career Planning and Placement; and more specifically, of the Director Larry Simmons.

As a sincere and thoughtful person, Larry is willing to speak with any student offering helpful guidance and sympathetic views. He is concerned about the student, and this becomes obvious at every meeting. As the Director, Larry is well-informed about career opportunities, career planning, graduate school assistance, summer jobs, resumes, and various other areas.

So, if you ever want some help in planning your future, or just need a shoulder to cry on, see Larry Simmons for some good advice.

Larry – Thanks for being here.

Sincerely,
Barbara Berman

Boycott Bookstore

To the Editor:

The time has at last arrived for some effective student action against the UVM bookstore. Pre-registration is over and students know to some extent what courses they'll be taking next semester. The bookstore will be ordering books soon if it hasn't already. Here is my suggestion for action. If the students don't like the prices the bookstore charges for books and other items, let them take their business elsewhere and boycott the bookstore. There are at least two other bookstores in town which are willing to advance order textbooks that students require. Students should find out the required reading for courses they know they'll be taking and advance order their books now. One bookstore has a co-operative buying arrangement whereby the student could save perhaps as much as 10% on the price of books. On a bill of $80 for books, which I imagine is not uncommon, a savings of 10% is substantial. In this situation of monopoly by the bookstore, the only sure way of bringing prices for all items down is for students to take their business elsewhere. The students can only gain by taking their book orders to off-campus stores. As I have said before, I would be glad to hear from anyone who is interested in the bookstore issue, whether you favor a boycott or not. My phone number is 482-3011.

Serious plays

To the Editor:

With reference to your review of Pride and Prejudice, Mr. Lief is certainly entitled to his opinion regarding the merits of the production. However, he ends his comments with a question that deserves an answer. The question is why can't we see some serious modern drama?

I would like to point out that in the same issue is a story about the One Act Festival starting December 6th. There are six modern plays being presented in a period of eight days. Also, in the past year the Theatre has presented MacBett, Play Strindberg, Under Milkwood, West Side Story (which could be said to have some serious content), The Read Inspector Hound and several of the one act plays from the One Act Festival last spring.

Just because Mr. Lief has not been here to see them does not mean they didn't exist; I suggest he should do his research a little better – there are some facts.

Sincerely,
Barbara Phillips

P.S. Watch for The Chinese Wall – a most contemporary and thought provoking play to be presented February 4–8, 1976.

More Feature Articles

To the Editor:

Whatever happened to one of the most crucial tools of journalism? Your publication is doing a good job serving as a calendar of events, as a showcase for would-be authors and poets, as a capsule for reviewing social and sports events, but nowhere do I detect the slightest degree of good old-fashioned muckraking. The editors of this publication have the responsibility to keep the administration honest and to expose corruption or raise questions that you have concerning procedure or activity.

I can envision several interesting feature articles that would have to be carefully researched and objectively examined. For example, is it true that the College of Education graduated a student in 1973 who, in fact had not completed all his requirements as a Phys. Ed. major in teacher education? Was there shuffling or fanagling in some administrative office despite the hue and cry of phys. ed. instructors?

What is the net profit of the University Bookstore and to what extent is the student body being "ripped-off"?

Why are the charges of Buildings and Grounds so high whenever they must move furniture, install loudspeakers, etc?

The only complaints from students seem to be in the letter to the editor section. Remember the "Florida junket for plants" at the Living/Learning Center? I'm asking the Cynic staff to stick their collective neck out. Crusade, raise issues, fight, take a position of advocacy if necessary.

The esteemed professorial conclave of this great university continually proclaims through questionaires that it works an amazingly high number of hours per week. Why is this never examined or challenged? Why don't you see how often you find these scholars in their offices during their self-proclaimed office hours? How well do they know the college catalogue to effectively fulfill their roles as student advisors?

Let's see some feature articles that will shake this place up. Wake us from our present state of complacency. Keep 'em honest. Believe me, the power of the press can be used effectively to bring about change.

Trent Tatro

Editor's Note:

I agree that we have not had any "mudracking" articles this semester. There are many happenings on campus that need investigating. However, we have been seriously short-staffed this semester. We will welcome your help for next semester for investigative articles. If you are interested, get in contact with the Cynic.

Reagan's Conversion

To the Editor:

In light of Ronald Reagan's "official" announcement for the 1976 GOP Presidential Nomination the following is an excerpt from the July-August 1967 issue of DISSENT magazine in relation to Reagan's conversion from acting to politics.

At one point Ronald Reagan was $18,000 in debt and had resorted to emceeing a Las Vegas night-club act in a desperate attempt to make money. Revue, an MCA subsidiary, suggested a weekly dramatic program to GE which was then looking for a new television show. Reagan would emcee the program, star in six of the plays each year, and spend a few weeks each year making personal appearance tours for GE.

GE Theater ran from 1954 to 1962, and Reagan visited all 135 GE plants during that time and spoke before innumerable civic groups. After the first year, Reagan was accompanied by George Dalen, an ex-FBI agent, who was put in charge of the tours and promotion for GE Theater. Reagan's tours changed. His Hollywood gossip shifted to dire talk of the "attempted take-over of the industry by the Communists." He spoke of the GE union that "suffers from Communist infiltration amounting to outright domination" and warned his audiences of "the swiftly rising tide of collectivism that threatens to inundate what remains of our free economy."

Now Reagan no longer spoke only before GE employees. Soon his tours were scheduled for three years in advance, with speaking engagements at Chamber of Commerce banquets, national conventions, high-school assemblies, executive clubs, and so on. Reagan recruited members for Young Americans for Freedom, helped plan Los Angeles Project Alert, appeared with Fred Schwartz's Christian Anti-Communist Crusade, made an anti-Medicare recording for the AMA, and was campaign chairman for the John Birch Society supporter Lloyd Wright in the 1962 California GOP primary. He also was a featured speaker with Arkansas Governor Orval Faubus and Dr. George Benson Harding College at a joint meeting of the Arkansas Chamber of Commerce and the Associated Industries of Arkansas.

He kept attacking Social Security, federal aid to education, public housing, foreign aid, federal farm programs, and public power; and he called for the repeal of the income tax which he claimed was "spawned by Karl Marx." Reagan was always a representative of GE. They never indicated, he said, "I was singing the wrong song and should switch tunes."

The right-wing politics of Reagan and GE even carried over to GE Theater. In March 1962, for example, Reagan starred in a two-part program on Marion Miller, an FBI agent on whose testimony before HVAC right-wingers have capitalized (including her charges that the American Friends Service Committee was a belt line of the Communist conspiracy.)

John C. Stockwell

Graffitti Not Art

To the Editor:

I must respond to last week's letter of Mr. Blasdell and T. White, since they both failed to see my point.

First, I don't doubt the value of visual imagery, but when you force it upon an institution and its population it can only be termed vandalism. I doubt very much if a single board member or administrator, including the Chairman of the Art Department, would permit what was done. When art steps beyond the realm of a personal experience and violates the rights of others, it is no longer art, but graffitti. And Mr. Blasdell's comparison to bathroom scrawl really shocked me, since it was quite applicable.

Second, I must restate my previous position even though they have deemed it outrageous. I will strongly protest the use of University funds, especially with such drastic budget cuts, to clean the surfaces of the damaged buildings. However, Cook, Bailey, Living/Learning and all the others must be restored to the condition the architects and University had intended them to be. If Mr. Blasdell would like to paint the 288 symbols on his house or office, fine; but not where the beauty of Vermont becomes the subway of New York.

Richard Crimmins

Response To Letter

To the Editor:

In response to Bob Macgregor's letter printed in last week's Cynic:

There are a number of inaccuracies that need to be corrected. Sorry Bob, but the large majority of students were not left out of the decision-making process by design, rather by choice. The general assembly and its format were constructed with the purpose of giving the students a forum to express their opinions. That students have no opinions to express is no fault of the system. The General Assembly meeting was publicized throughout the campus, its time and place no secret.

Secondly, IF we are about to be "victimized by bessureucracy at UVM," why do you wait so long trying to stir up emotion (rather than thought) in face of such brutal manipulation? The necessity of the additions to both Library and Gym, speaking strictly in terms of people per square foot, is obvious to those who use either facility. This is only one of a long list of reasons for building either. Meaningful criticism of these projects should be carefully considered and well thought out.

At the end of your letter, you boast of willingness to generate opposition to the long and lithe "shaft" of the SA and Trustees. It's sorry to see someone like you, who obviously feels quite differently about these projects, trying to re-organize and re-establish resistance alone. The Student Association was created for the students after all. Why not use it?

Lastly Robert, your criticism is of the poorest quality. It's negativism is obvious, but no real solutions or compromises have been offered. Your timing gives your ideas benefit to no one, excepting yourself. I'm sure there are many who share your view, but have less motivation to express it. Might I suggest you leave a little of your self-centeredness behind and that you express your concern well before another snowball of unfairness begins its long plunge down the hillside, carefully packed by the SA and Trustees. Your ideas will then be a little more useful than these last.

Sincerely,
Tim Carney

PE Beneficial

To the Editor:

In response to Rob Macgregor's suggestions on eliminating the physical education requirement at UVM: While researching the material for the articles in the Cynic column "What Goes In", I have consistently found exercise to be one of the most beneficial factors in maintaining good health. Most college students, myself included, just do not make the time for a regular program of physical exercise. Although I cannot pinpoint the study, in Sweden, children are brought up with a required one-hour-a-day exercise schedule from kindergarten through college. The Swedish college graduate tends to continue this program throughout his or her life because it has been integrated into the daily routine. Moreover, a 50-year-old Swedish man is said to be as physically fit as a 25 year-old American male.

Many students would never see the gym or other athletic facilities if they were not required to take one year of phys ed which is usually dismissed with by sophomore year. Eradicating the physical education requirement would eliminate the need for facilities that would be used only by the people who already have incorporated exercise into their lives. But this is not the point of an educational experience. Students should be demanding an equal chance to use athletic facilities that are in good condition in order to improve their physical beings as well as their intellectual capacities. If anything should be done with the phys ed requirements, it too should be expanded—to four years. Getting off our butts two times a week for four years couldn't kill us and might be a worthwhile endeavor.

Sincerely,
Cindy Theall

UVM Not A Subway

To the Editor:

Prof. Blasdell's recent assignment was not an expression of art, but rather an exercise in vandalism. The faces of the buildings at this University were not meant to be the recipients of such an immature prank.

How can Prof. Blasdell justify the imposition of his will upon property that is not his to be imposed upon, especially through the use of a cheap can of spray paint.

Prof., you are responsible for an arrogant, immature and disgusting display of thoughtlessness. I wonder if you would hold the same positive attitude toward an expanded visual consciousness if students had selected instead your car, house, dog, kids...

It is my hope that when those marks are removed, you are presented with the bill, for I protest the use of scarce University funds for such a clean-up.

A great many people come to this school to be a bit closer to a clean and unprostituted environment, not a New York subway moved north.

Your assignment was not art, but trash.

America is facing a difficult and enormously important decision. Should we become dependent on nuclear power for the production of our electricity? The decision is crucial because nuclear power poses risks to mankind that are almost beyond comprehension.

ARE THE PLANTS SAFE?

Nothing is accident-proof. The safety engineering for the Apollo missions was magnificent, yet three astronauts died on the launching pad in an accident that professionals said could never happen.

The ultimate safety of American nuclear plants depends on the emergency core cooling system (ECCS) which is designed to prevent overheating of the nuclear fuel. If normal cooling water were lost through a pipe rupture, the ECCS would have to flood the reactor fuel with new water to prevent a meltdown of a reactor core and subsequent release of lethal radioactivity to the environment.

The ECCS has never been fully tested. And in a series of small scale tests it failed six out of six times. Many scientists question whether the system would work under actual accident conditions.

LOW LEVEL RADIATION

All nuclear power plants emit low level radiation in the course of normal operation. But even extremely low amounts of radioactivity can cause cancer and genetic mutations.

In 1972, a National Academy of Sciences committee estimated that if the entire population were exposed to the maximum permissible exposure under federal standards there would be "roughly 3,000 to 15,000 cancer deaths annually."

RADIOACTIVE WASTES

Nuclear plants produce large amounts of deadly radioactive wastes, some of which must be completely isolated from people and the environment for 500,000 years.

One of the worst is plutonium 239, the most poisonous element known to man. A single pound of this deadly substance, dispersed as pollen-sized particles, represents the potential for billions of lung cancers.

At present, there is no suitable means of disposing of radioactive wastes, and since there are no solutions in sight the wastes are being stored above ground. Over 500,000 gallons of radioactive wastes have leaked from the storage tanks at Hanford, Washington, permanently contaminating the soil.

IS NUCLEAR ENERGY CHEAP?

Nuclear Power was supposed to be "too cheap to meter." But the economic miracle turned out to be a lemon. Despite billions of dollars in government subsidies, nuclear power costs are far higher than promised.

Vermont Yankee Nuclear Power Plant at Vernon and other nuclear power plants have been erratic in operation and a wide range of defects and human errors have led to frequent shutdowns. At any given time about one-third of the nation's nuclear power plants are out of operation. At Vermont Yankee the costs of the electricity produced has been over four times higher than promised.

Abolish Tenure

by Malcolm Curtis
Courtesy of the Campus, Bishop's College in Lennoxville, Quebec.

In light of the Faculty's recent decision to unionize, the priorities of the Student's Executive Council have had to shift rather suddenly.

The urgency of the matter is apparent. Come January, students could find themselves without a voice in University government and at the same time confronted with a powerful faculty union bent on firmly protecting job security.

Although the Association of Professors at Bishop's University (APBU) have not yet established any goals, it is a sure bet that job security will be high on the union's list of priorities. And at Bishop's, Tenure, viewed by many students as an "antiquated monstrosity," is almost synonymous with job security. APBU will be very reluctant to see the system of Tenure die an easy death. For years now, students at Bishop's have cried out against Tenure. But for many students here, the term "Tenure" has an unfamiliar ring to it. Campus reporter Anne MacTavish recently interviewed twenty or so students at random on the matter, and discovered that few of them really know exactly what Tenure is. What is tenure? According to Bishop's Rules, Orders and Regulations, Tenure means "permanency of appointment and the right of a faculty member not to be dismissed except for a cause." "Cause" usually means "gross incompetence," which is a difficult charge to pin down on any professor. Tenure was originally developed to protect the freedom of Faculty to express professional opinions without fear of discharge. However the importance of this guarantee of academic freedom, has diminished with the changing political climate in Canada, and the increased protection of speech that the courts have given individuals. Additionally, it is felt that the protections of academic freedom guaranteed by tenure, should be extended to non-tenured people as well.

Stripped of this pretense about academic freedom, Tenure is in its bare-bones nothing more than guaranteed job security. And what job security. Once a professor is granted tenure he is never again evaluated except for purposes of promotion. As the system presently works, only the Principal can dismiss a tenured professor.

THE STUDENT POSITION

The system of Tenure shelters incompetence, and deprives the University of a fresh, constantly changing academic outlook. Members of the S.E.C. executive see the formation of APBU as a further deterioration in the academic state of affairs here, because it is believed the Union will want to fortify and strengthen their tenured status.

For Student Ombudsman David Dussault, Tenure is "clearly the most important issue" that the SEC has to act upon at this time. In a Campus interview Dussault charged that "Tenure stands in the way of upgrading standards of Education at Bishop's." He feels that the idea of Tenure has become a "farce." The importance of the Tenure issue cannot be underestimated. With approximately two-thirds of Faculty tenured, Bishop's has become a retirement home protecting recalcitrant and inefficient departments and at the same time retaining professors of low teaching competence, who at any other university of worth would be laughed out of a gown. (There are exceptions to the rule of course.)

As an outcome of this Wednesday's SEC meeting, it is speculated that the SEC will draft a report, recommending among other things, the abolition of Tenure at Bishop's and the introduction of a system of review which would periodically assess the capabilities and competence of a professor. The report would be forwarded to the APBU and the Corporation.

THE FUTURE OF TENURE

Just what are the chances of Tenure being abolished at Bishop's? It is difficult to say. Movements to abolish Tenure in the past have met with adamant resistance from all sides. Indications show that the Corporation might not look unfavorably upon the idea of scrapping Tenure. But on the other hand, once APBU is certified the Faculty will be in a strong position to resist such a manoeuvre. It is important that students make their position perfectly clear before APBU is certified. Tenure should be abolished.

Looking For Louise...

by Gregory Katz

That afternoon I went out to Hinesburg with Poot. It was either that or hang around with Jeddyboy. We went to the school where Poot worked. It was high on a ridge, and they had a lot of animals and stuff like that. It was very pretty, very calm and productive. The only problem was that it made me sort of want to vomit. Or maybe it was the remains of my hangover.

Poot had to make dinner for all the staff that night. I helped him cook it. We sauteed some perch, and threw it in a wok with a ton of broccoli and onions. I made a very strange sauce out of lemon and curry powder. It was designed to inflame anyone who overindulged. Poot made some rolls too.

Dinner was served at a huge oak table. All the staff came and filled their plates and sat down. It was very mellow and boring. All the talk was about "the kids" and their "problems." It was weird, cause I remembered Poot as he was in high school just five years ago. He was a kid then, with problems coming out of his ass. And he sure wouldn't have taken part in this hocus-pocus dinner table talk. But Poot had a way of shedding things, letting them bounce right off him without going deep. After dinner we walked around outside. I said hello to George, who was a six week old bull. He was very nice. I even bottle fed him his "formula." Poot said George was for sale. Hay prices were soaring and animals could be had for dirt-cheap. I considered buying George and depositing him in Ingrid's apartment, as sort of a practical joke. But she might not get it.

Poot had built a sort of basketball court on the second floor of the hayloft. Actually he had just set up a basket at one end and cleared out the space around it. But you could play one-on-one up there. It was fun; every once in a while the ball rolled off the edge and you had to jump into a huge pile of hay to get it back. We played one-on-one to a hundred. That's a lot of ball to play. It becomes a ritual after a while. We started off hot and heavy, then slowed down to a mutually acceptable pace. Poot couldn't beat me at one-on-one, not anymore. In Colorado two years ago I whupped him 100-74, and since then he hasn't beat me once. But Eddy can beat me at it almost all the time, which doesn't make any sense. Because Poot is the best player of us all, then me, and Eddy's the worst. But in one-on-one that didn't matter. In real full court madness though, Eddy was almost useless. He watched it go by.

Playing one-on-one to a hundred is good for your soul. You clean out all the alcohol in your system, and other bad stuff to. When my last bucket swished through, I walked outside and sat on the cool hard ground. It's true that I wanted to leave Vermont, but it's so damn pretty here. That moon always lights the fields in a special way. Maybe I wanted to leave because it was so beautiful. I don't really know.

"I've gotta get out of here Poot. It's all happening to me. I have no force. It's so pretty that it hurts."

"I'd like to leave too. I've been here too long. I feel de-activated and like that. This place is too settled for me."

"It's like when I told my sister I couldn't stand to be in one place for five minutes. I meant it. But with Ingrid I could sit still for days on end. Why's it always so hard? Why does something good go so sour?

"Let it go Greg. We had this talk last night. Once is enough."

"Why doesn't it ever happen to you?"

"I don't know. I guess I sort of just don't let it. But I get hurt too. People don't see it sometimes though. They have this idea that I'm always happy. It's a pain in the ass sometimes, cause they expect me to be Mr. Cosmic all the time. Like around here. The entire fucking school comes to me with their problems. What can I do? I listen, I say what I think. But I need room to be untogether too. If I have an off day here, it's like I'm letting down the whole world."

"But no girls ever broken your heart."

"No, I guess not. Maybe I roll with things better than you do, Greg. I don't know. But if you feel like leaving Vermont, you should go. Don't hang around saying you want to split."

"I got a trial in 4 weeks."

"Oh yeah, I forgot. What are you gonna do about that?"

"I've got a plan. I figure first I'll offer to cop a plea, I'll get them down to "Vandalism with mischievous intent," then I'll cop another plea, and get down to "Breach of Peace." Then I'll plead guilty to that. I like Breach of Peace. It fits my character."

"Why should they keep reducing your charge?"

"I haven't figured that part out yet. I think I'll offer them information about the conspiracy that put me up to the job. Then I'll give them phony info, maybe implicate Shell Oil or someone like that. By the time they find out it's bullshit, I'm out of Vermont anyway."

"Greg, I think you should get a lawyer. It sounds to me like you're just gonna get in deeper and deeper. They won't believe Shell Oil hired you to run a motorboat into a Mobil tanker."

"Maybe you're right."

Soon it was time to call Chinooski. I figured he would be pissed at me at first, but I figured it was worth a try. He did, after all, need a man to roll out pizzas on the nightshift. It was not a very popular job.

We walked back to the main house. I went into an office and called Hank. Some woman answered the phone.

"Hello. Is Hank there?"

"What?" The woman sounded drunk, or screwy, or something.

"Is Mr. Chinooski there?" I tried again.

"Yeah, but he's busy. This is after hours. What do you want anyway?"

"I want to talk to Hank. This is Chuck, an old army buddy."

"Hank was never in no army."

"Listen, just let me talk to him, O.K.?" I could hear her put her hand over the phone and yell to Hank that someone wanted to talk to him. I could hear a groaning sound, then some footsteps.

"Hello?" I could smell the whiskey on Hank's breath. He sounded happy.

"Hank, this is Greg. I want my job back. I need to work for 4 weeks till my trial."

"Driveastick?"

"What?"

"I said can you drive a stick?"

"Yeah sure."

"OK, you deliver the same shift. Enzo quit today. Some girl answered the door naked, took the pizza, didn't pay him, and slammed the door in his face. He quit. You can be him for awhile."

"Great Hank. I'll be there tomorrow."

"O.K. kid, but listen, don't, do not ever call me again after dark. It's after hours. I am attending to private business and do not like to think of pizza."

"Right Hank. Never again." I hung up.

Delivery man!! Oh boy. I couldn't wait. I got to wear red and white striped shirts and drive those crazy motorized tricycles with the hot box in back. And a crash helmet. Pure bliss. And if some naked dame answers the door when I'm there she'll get more than a pizza.

I burst into the living room. Poot and two women were discussing Laura, a sixteen year old who thought she was from another planet. "Poot, I'm saved! I'm a Hollow Man Delivery Man for four weeks. Then I split. Isn't that great."

I slept in the hayloft that night, wrapped up in my down bag. It was nice to be all alone. I snuggled in my bag, letting things be still. I found my mind turning to Ingrid, and I tried to turn it off. But it had been a month since I had seen her, a month since I had any contact at all with the female race. I kept thinking, "Things have changed. I'm different now. Maybe that tension will be gone, maybe she's finally healthy again." And when I thought she might be healthy I thought about fucking her, fucking her in the woods down in back of my brother's house. It was a fact that it had been a month though. And yet something in me felt so good lying here by myself.

So there were two things going on. I felt good being alone, and I missed her down deep inside, deep where I thought things could be ok. I figured that, after all the shit I had been through, maybe being alone was the best thing. I had to erase Jeddyboy from my mind, forget about Buddha, not worry that Eddy would make it as a piano star while I made pizzas, and just exist. I was good at that. Robot consciousness fits me well. But then there is the emptiness...

Did you ever know something was the right thing to do, and know you couldn't do it? It was like that. I knew Ingrid was all wrong for me, that seeing her would shake me up and rattle my soul, but some part of me had to go see her. Well I accepted that inside of me, and fell asleep preparing my speech.

I loved my crash helmet! It was white with a red stripe down the middle. I shoved it over my hair, and pulled it down over my ears. I felt sort of like a souped-up owl! Chinooski showed me how to drive the big trike. It was a cinch for an old-pro like me. You just floored the fucker till you attained maximum speed of 40, then you downshifted and rammed the wheel sideways for your turns, and the slowing momentum of downshifting counteracted the spinout force of 90-degree turns. The thing had a tendency to tip over, or so Chinooski told me. I didn't really consider that possibility.

I borrowed a black leather jacket from Eddy. It had big silver buttons, and fit nice and tight. I zipped it up all the way, fastened my crash helmet, and reported for duty.

I felt sorry for the schnook behind the machines rolling out the pizzas. I knew his job, how he wouldn't get to see a person for eight hour stretches. Me, I would be out in the world, cruising, knocking on stranger's doors saying "Hollow Man here," and getting tips from voluptuous young widows. Most likely I would be married within a week!

It was a job where amphetamines would serve you poorly. It was impossible to push those silly tricycles past forty, and speed would make me want to take off into the lake and try and get the little buggers to float. They would not float.

So I was straight, sober, and upright when my first delivery came. It was a 5 past eight. I had to bring two pizzas to a house on Wells St. It was right near the place that me and Eddy had destroyed. I loaded the pizzas in the hot box, turned on the machine and gunned it. It didn't really purr, like Eric's Benz, or ROAR like my brother's Suzuki, but it did get off the line. When I turned right onto Flynn Ave. there was a kind of tippy feeling. It was strange to only have one front wheel. I was out near the lake, near where I had stolen the boat. Then I rammed a left on Wells St., and pulled up in front of No. 64. It was a big old grey house divided into 7 apartments. I wondered if any of them had waterbeds.

I parked my trike, unlocked the hotbox, and pulled out the two pizzas. I was looking for No. 6. I climbed the stairs, found No. 6 and knocked.

An old woman answered the door, with a greying face but

ARTS & ENTERTAINMENT

Nutcracker- Cultured Burger King

by Tricia John

As a traditional Burlington initiation rite to Christmastide, Memorial Auditorium hosted the Hartford Ballet and the Vermont Symphony Ballet Orchestra in their performance of Tchaikovsky's Nutcracker last Saturday night. The show was of some disappointment (mostly due to the orchestra), but there were also many surprises that delighted both the audience and this reviewer.

After a good forty minutes of delay, an apology was made by artistic director Michael Uthoff for technical difficulties. The orchestra then screetched out the overture, although with consistent good quality from the woodwinds. Some sections in the score were performed well by all the members of the orchestra, but the majority of the time the strings were sloppy in tempo and intonation. This unmeticulousness was at times quite distracting.

The prologue maintained conventional setting and costumes. Most notable was the Hartford Junior Ballet. Diane Wolfson as Clara and Valerie Bloomfield as Fritz were superb as they outdid the adults in style and timing.

Rudy D'Angona played the role of Dr. Drosselmeyer, the children's magical godfather. He and his three life-size dolls also highlighted the scene. His dancing conveyed a delightful amount of enigma without tones of evil or malice, which some interpretation cannot avoid.

Mice and toy-soldiers were brought to human dimensions in Clara's dreams in Act I. The children once again displayed an impressive dance sequence as the mice and soldiers battled it out.

In the second scene of Act I, Clara's nutcracker gift is transformed into the Nutcracker Prince (Ronald Roux) and he leads her through the Land of Snow. The Snow King and Queen along with their dancing snowflakes set the stage for the fantastic imagery and dancing of the next act.

Act II always surpasses the prologue in terms of sensational dancing. The Castle of the Sugar Plum Fairy offered many different dance motifs, each dance representing a culinary delight for Clara.

The "Arabian Coffee Corps" featured an excellent oboe solo. The seductive dancers moved to the hypnotic 3/8 time of this subdued piece. Of the castle temptations, this was most effectively done.

The "Russian Trepak" was received most enthusiastically by the audience. The fast vivid tempo reminds one of a peasant dance, and thus Thomas Giroir and Clover Mathus danced and leaped in 2/4 time. Although this vigorous dance demanded a great degree of outstanding dancing, the timing of the dancers was off – perhaps due to the orchestra; it is difficult to say.

The "Waltz of the Flowers," illustrating Tchaikovsky's full potential as a ballet composer, was performed brilliantly by Debra McLaughlin as the Dew Drop Fairy, and her cavaliers, Kevin Ayeldotte and Robert Buntzen. The harp's cadenza was also done skillfully. It was the first instance in the evening's performance that both dancers and musicians seemed totally united, totally blended. The first violins were continuously bad, but because of the splendor of the dancing and excellence of the rest of the orchestra, such shortcomings were almost ignored. The Dew Drop Fairy and her two male counterparts were indeed the highlight of the evening.

The "Grande Pas de Deux" featured our Sugar Plum Fairy and Nutcracker Prince dancing and frolicking with exquisite self-assurance and charm. Their dancing was admirable but choreography not too exciting.

After all is said and done, one can not help approaching the Nutcracker as a ballet not so much for the connoisseur but for the family – a cultured Burger King for children at Christmas time. The audience and the performance so warranted such a description. Merry Christmas.

Film: Growing Up Female

Growing Up Female: As Six Become One shows the socialization of the American woman through a personal look into the lives of six females. Their ages range from 4 to 35, and their backgrounds vary from poor black to upper-middle class white. We see in action how many forces shape them: Their parents, teachers, guidance counsellors, the media and advertising, pop music and the institution of marriage. It is a compelling film that demands one to respond.

"Seeing Growing Up Female is one of those painful experiences that's good for you. With a minimum of comment, the film shows how female human beings are brainwashed into passivity, mental sluggishness, and self-contempt. I wish every high school kid in America could see the film." Susan Sontag, film critic, writer and filmmaker.

"The most comprehensive and sociologically ambitious film to come out of the current women's movement. The points made are valid and need to be shouted, thought and talked about." Media and Methods.

"A true and piercing look at American womanhood today." Gloria Steinem, writer, editor, Ms. Magazine.

Anything You Want To Be: "The heroine is a bright high school girl who is told she can be anything she wants to be. But when she tries to run for class president, she is deflected toward the office of class secretary; when she tells the guidance counsellor of her ambition to become a doctor, she is gently urged to become a nurse instead. When she fantasizes about her future life, her dreams become nightmares peopled by the stereotypes created by the mass media." Journal of the American Psychiatric Association.

The films will be shown Thursday night, December 11, 7:00 and 8:30 at the First Unitarian Church (top of Church St.). Donations will be appreciated to pay for film rental and to benefit Shaker Mountain School.

Pansy

Pansy wants to ride in a balloon visions of rocket ships, traveling to the moon they're not the same without the wind flying in the breezes, feeling the life within

Pansy loves to cry when the sun gets too bright its such a delight to feel the tears stream down the side of his face makes the hurt a little easier to erase when someone says he shouldn't cry or laugh or smile or dream of sensuous breezes but belong to ibm and pull out a knife and cut someone down who doesn't agree with him and sit atop a wife on a pedestal of his delight not listening, caring, sharing but rolling like a stone robot ready to be wound up from day to day play with trucks and machine guns and learn to kill the urge to be loving

PANSY! Don't play with the flowers, birds, or dolls we don't want you to grow up so others think something is wrong with you...

Pansy dreams of rocketships now mac ton trucks and racing cars super computers and machine gun wars strategy logic numbers

no more flowers for pansy
he doesn't smell the rain
he cannot express the pain all he can do is explain and refrain from his fantasies

Pansy, where did you go?
you were a flower once you loved to feel the sand between your toes where did that freedom go?

Space Odyssey 'Jiva' Review And 1975 Wrap up

by Paul Prior

The under-assistant east Coast promotion man for A&M Records was kind enough to drop some records by the Cynic a few weeks back. Among them was a record entitled Jiva, also the name of the group. From the record cover: "Jiva comes from the Sanskrit root 'Jiv,' which means 'to breathe.' Jiva is 'that which breathes and is commonly used to signify the soul'." Jiva is actually on the Dark Horse label, and so this critically mystic cosmic karma comes from the George Harrison School For Good Vibes. The musically astute in the audience may note that Jiva is also being pushed extensively in the city of Burlington, most blatantly in the display window at Baily's, which is selling Jiva T-Shirts this week.

What lies beneath this facade of promotion and hype? Well, they aren't really the most innovative group around, to put it mildly. Jiva fails to have a unique sound, a sound that would make you want to run out and buy the disk. In fact, if I had paid for my copy, I would have felt ripped-off. Technically, the band is competent. With a steady bass and drum riff as a foundation, the songs are written around it. The major problem is that while the rhythm is there, the quality of the rest of the music suffers by comparison. The lead/rhythm guitar work fails to rise above standard bar-band technique, an occasional searing lead-guitar lick, with a little rhythm strummed along, and some decent choruses. The lyrics are banal, with the emphasis on dreaming and love, stuff that Karen Carpenter would be ashamed to admit to. John Denver might dig it, but not this reviewer. I was going to quote some lyrics for you, but I just couldn't bring myself to subject you to something like this:

> It's time, you know...try... try..., It's time you know, can we bring you, Bring you just a little bit closer. It's time, you know... how to fly..., It's time you know... what?... soul soul soul soul.

No more, please, no more! It's enough to give someone Karmic Congestion. The band Jiva borrows from a variety of styles – reggae, Motown-like vocals, Soul-Train oriented rhythm guitar – basically so-so dance music at best, with a 'touch' of professionalism. But if you ask if they're worth the amount of promotion they've been getting, my answer would have to be no.

This will be the last column before Christmas, so I figured that a 1975 Wrap-Up might be in order. This was the year of the comeback, whether it was Crosby, Stills, Nash, and Young or Neil Sedaka. Many big names resurfaced to cash in the nostalgia craze, prompting me to wonder if K-Tel will be offering a 1967 "Acid Rock Bonanza". (Announcer's voice: Who can forget the San Francisco Sound, flower power, 'White Rabbit' and the Strawberry Alarm Clock?) This was also the year when Cher made the cover of Time, as well as making Greg Allman: "It's so nice to see Greg's eyes clear again." Better luck next time, Cher.

1975 also brought us some fine white funk. Aside from Little Feat's special brand of blues and soul, Robert Palmer emerged as an up-and-coming star in his own right. He has two fine solo efforts out on Island Records, "Sneakin' Through the Alley with Sally" and "Pressure Drop." Both records have Little Feat and The Meters backing him up, making for an overall knock-out performance. Jeff Beck made a comeback also, after a lengthy battle with heroin, and also "got funky" with Blow By Blow, which came out last April. This year was also noteworthy for molding jazz/funk/and rock. Chick Corea and Return to Forever are perhaps the best examples of this fusion. Old standbys such as The Dead came back strong after a year's vacation from touring and recording with Blues for Allah, also reflecting a funkish/-reggaeish influence. San Francisco bands made strong contributions this year, most exceptional was the release of Jefferson Starship's Red Octopus, a worthy successor to their Dragonfly album. Orleans released their "official" second album, some of it excellent, most of it disappointing compared to their first L.P. on ABC records. Bonnie Raitt released Home Plate and captured my heart. Her finest recorded effort to date, she sings, she plays incredible guitar, and is backed by the best session men around. Led Zeppelin and The Who both released albums this year and proved that the English bands still can rock and roll with the best of them. Physical Graffiti and Ily Numbers, respectively, have both been played endlessly in Ozone Headquarters North and South.

As I sat in Recital Hall waiting for the Concord String Quartet to begin, I contemplated last summer, when I listened weekly to the faculty of the Yale Music School reaching near perfection in Norfolk, Connecticut. Splendid Sounds of the Concord

by Tricia John

As I sat in Recital Hall waiting for the Concord String Quartet to begin, I contemplated last summer, when I listened weekly to the faculty of the Yale Music School reaching near perfection in Norfolk, Connecticut. How will the young men of the Concord ever compare to the glorious Yale faculty? Illogically expecting major disappointment, I was greatly surprised to hear last Monday a superb, brilliant concert. This great, critical mind was awed at the passionate performance of the 2nd, 3rd, and 5th Bartok quartets.

The Concord sacrificed nothing for intense, penetrating interpretation of the three Bartok quartets. The first movement of the 2nd Quartet was indicative of the passionate composition heard through out Bartok's quartets. The driving force of the 2nd quartet never slackened through all three movements. Each climatic section seemed to exude to an even more fervid passage. The 2nd quartet left one so exhausted afterwards that it was difficult to understand how the musicians could actually continue with the next piece. The performance was not only excellent in precision and intonation, but their interpretation was the essence of what Bartok intended.

String Quartet Number 3 was the shortest of the quartets. Bartok's brevity was suggestive of more intensity because it was so compact. Perhaps my only criticism of the quartet (and the concert) was the pizzicato section of the 2nd movement between cello and viola. The sound could have been clearer, but instead a muffled effect was created.

The fifth Quartet, longest of the three, was featured after intermission. This extensive piece in five movements is arch-form, which means that both of the first and fifth movements are identical in form (in this case being sonata form) and the 2nd and 4th movements are also identical (in ternary form.) I found most interesting the scherzo and the fifth movement. Running through the scherzo is Bartok's themes of his folk culture. The fifth movement, as a coda, had clearly defined sections working up to an intense climax, upon which a very simple child-like tune was introduced. After a few bars of this intentional nonsense, the mood was once again switched to the driving, sensational finish of the coda. It was an exciting ending to the quartet, as well as the concert.

I left the concert happy, exhausted, and exceptionally pleased at hearing such fabulous music making. I cannot emphasize epough the general superbness of the Concord. All musicians, Mark Sokol, and Andrew Jennings, violins, John Kochanowski, viola, and Norman Fischer, cello, displayed tremendous musicality. I suppose as passion was the key word to Bartok's quartets, precision and phenomenal intonation were the keys to the Concord's overall performance. I had not heard better anywhere.

It's also nice to hear some fine new tunes from The Band with their latest l.p. just barely released, as well as the exceptional song from Mr. Dylan entitled "Hurricane." Maybe it's a comeback year for everyone. Richard Nixon is due for a major release this year, a comedy/nostalgia album, I'm Not a Crook, also subtitled I couldn't get it down pat. I'd like to close with my nomination for Best Group and Best Album of 1975: Little Feat, best group; their release The Last Record Album is the finest album I've heard in some time. They beat the competition hands down, and feats up. A Good Christmas to all, and to all a "Good Night."

Campus Life Insurance

by Allan Rabinowitz and Joel Makower

(CPS) — If you are a college senior, there is a good chance you will soon get a call from a life insurance agent. Perhaps you may not even be aware what the friendly, self-assured voice on the phone is talking about. Instead of the phrase "life insurance", you may hear "savings investment and disability plan," or something impressive and academic-sounding, like the 'College Master Program." But save no doubt, the man is talking about life insurance.

Campus life insurance is a rapidly growing, $5 billion per year business. Under pressure from a glib salesman, students may find themselves suddenly stuck with a product they don't need, don't understand and can't afford.

Insurance salesmen are not all devils, and insurance is not necessarily a dirty word. But all terms of a policy should be carefully read and understood. Don't let an agent, in his eagerness for a commission (one agent said he would lost his job if he said how much his commission was), convince you to make a snap decision. Don't be swayed by a heart-breaking story about how happy you would make your parents if they discovered, upon your sudden death, that you left them money through a life insurance policy (agents sometimes use that logic).

There are two basic kinds of life insurance: "term" insurance and "whole life" insurance.

Term insurance provides basic protection upon the client's death, with no extras. It lasts for a pre-determined time period, such as five years. After that time, the policy is renewable, but the premium (the yearly amount you pay) will have risen. The premium is generally low for young people, since statistically they have a slight chance of dying young. But since a person's chances of dying increase over time, so do the premiums.

"Whole life" insurance charges a premium that never changes as long as you hold the policy, which is usually your whole life. Every year you pay the same amount. Although this amount may be higher than the amount you pay for a term policy at age 20, it will be much lower than the amount you pay on a similar term policy in later years. Most campus life insurance is the whole life type.

Whole life policies carry many complicating clauses. There is the "cash value", a kind of savings account, which grows over the life of the policy. You can borrow from these funds, with interest. If you drop your policy later, you get back the cash value portion.

The popular myth about a whole life insurance policy is that the younger you are when you buy it, the cheaper it will be for the rest of your life. It is true that the premium you pay on a policy opened at age 20 will be less than the premium on the same policy opened at age 25 or 30. And, of course, that is the premium you pay for the rest of your life. But this can be misleading, due to the cash value aspect of your policy.

Each year's premium is divided up. Part of it goes toward your actual protection, part of it goes to your savings account, the cash value.

Where is it written that you must offer an automated belt-drive single-play turntable for more than $89.95?

BSR
Consumer Products Group
BSR (USA) Ltd. • Blauvelt, N.Y. 10913

"The Silent Performer"

We will admit that ultra-silent belt-drive operation has come to be associated with the finest in expensive manual record playing devices. Nevertheless, with backing from the largest and most resourceful turntable manufacturer, BSR engineers have successfully integrated belt-drive into much more affordable players.

The Model 2SBP (pictured above) is a fully automated single-play turntable. It is replete with sophisticated features and top performance which can be found only on units costing significantly more. The precision machined platter is smoothly driven by a high torque multi-pole synchronous motor which will adjust at the proper rate regardless of fluctuations in line voltage or load. The tubular aluminum tone arm is dynamically optimized for minimal tracking weight distribution for minimum distortion. The arm is suspended in a matched gimbal and incorporates a fully adjustable vertically mounted counterweight.

Other features include a quiet, self-lubricating Delrin cam gear, convenient slide control operation, viscous damped cueing, dual range anti-skate control, automatic tone arm lock, single play rotating spindle and a handsome base with covered accessory tray and hinged dust cover.

You can offer the 2SBP at an amazing $89.95 and you can offer the 20 BPX (which includes a factory mounted ADC K8E) cartridge at $69.95 both with full margins! You can package them in low cost, high performance component systems that will give you that all-important edge over your competition.

HEW Approves UVM Plan

by Mary D. Partridge

BURLINGTON---UVM's Affirmative Action Plan was approved by a team of three Health, Education and Welfare (HEW) representatives last Thursday.

Affirmative Action, a government requirement for all institutions which receive more than $50,000 annually in federal funds, is a program which promotes equal employment opportunities for women and minorities.

"The HEW team found that no patterns of discrimination exist here," said Dr. Delores Sandoval-Stocker, UVM's Affirmative Action officer. "This does not mean that individual discrimination does not take place though," she added.

Minorities, as defined by Affirmative Action, include racial minorities but not ethnic minorities such as Italian or Franco-Americans. Sandoval-Stocker pointed out that racial minorities are badly represented at UVM, both as students and as faculty.

Out of 7,000 UVM undergraduates, only 118 are minorities (52 per cent are women). There are six black faculty members and seven from other minority groups. (Women account for 18.3 per cent of the faculty this semester.)

A department has the right to hire the most qualified applicant for a position but one might ask, "How did that applicant become the most qualified?" Women and minority group members often are not given the grants, scholarships and high quality early education that white males receive, according to Sandoval-Stocker.

At this time, most of UVM's academic departments have neither the need nor the funds to expand, and they cannot fire tenured faculty. Women and minority applicants may have to wait years before there are job openings.

UVM is the sixth New England university to have an approved Affirmative Action Plan under HEW guidelines. The UVM plan was tentatively approved as a written plan earlier this fall, but before it could be officially accepted, HEW had to conduct an on-site review to insure that Affirmative Action is an integrated philosophy at UVM.

The team, which consisted of two men and a woman, all black, met with a variety of faculty and staff members and students. They were particularly interested in talking with representatives from departments which have few or no women and/or minorities.

The UVM Affirmative Action Plan is made up of four parts: the first describes equal employment policies at the University; the second outlines Affirmative Action policies; the third part is a compilation of statistics concerning the employment of women and minorities at UVM; and the fourth is a selection of documents demonstrating UVM's supportive approach to equal employment.

Affirmative Action, initiated by President Johnson, was initiated into government-subsidized business firms and corporations in 1968, and in 1972 it was introduced into institutions of higher education. "Neither Nixon nor Ford has really supported Affirmative Action," Sandoval-Stocker said.

Dr. Falk Sees Need For Global Society

by Gladys Lodge

The connection between environmental values and the search for humane political, social and economic order was the topic the Dr. Richard Falk addressed at the Conservation Society of Southern Vermont Convention in Putney, October 25. The following is a condensation of his talk as I understand it.

Nuclear explosions made people aware that the kind of technology allowed to bring them progress was capable of producing the most awsome disasters. This fear may have prevented a third world war. But what we call peace between the principal centers of power rests on the exchange of genocidal threats, and wars are tolerated at the edges of the system between those who do not matter in global terms.

There was no sign of disposition to change this condition until the ecological bomb exploded creating a strong case for human solidarity and global planning.

While the deterrent effect of genocidal war seemed to have some logic and effect, there is no comparable logic for the ecological chaos of 150 or so world sovereignties each trying to maximize its wealth, power and prestige in material terms and accountable to no one for environmental protection of the planet.

Yet efforts to protect the environment are being attacked. The third world and the poor claim that the ecological issues are being used to avoid dealing with human need and misery, and that the problem lies in the profit motivation of the capitalistic world. Insensitivity to human needs gives this credibility, but the largest non-capitalistic country is as promiscuous in its treatment of environmental values as is the largest capitalistic country. It is the materialistic ethos, underlying both systems, that dooms the environment.

But as the poor see the environmental issue as a threat, environmental improvement will not be promoted in a democratic society, unless social and economic conditions improve at the same time.

The poor say let's worry about the environment later and deal with poverty now. But this won't work. It is too costly to delay environmental reform, and the poor are sacrificial victims of the deteriorating environment. (Note that polluting industries are even moving to the third world.)

An opposite view of the situation is that the ecological challenge is so severe, that we are so over-populated, and so under-capable of providing needed resources, that we have to give up the search for a humane world in order to save some part of humanity. This is of course the elite sacrificing the poor. The argument asks: Shall we have a totalitarian system controling reproduction? Shall we stop the prospect of any human survival? Criticisms of this view are that: 1. It favors only the rich. 2. It assumes that reducing one variable, the poor, will solve the problem. This is too simplistic. 3. It creates in me (Dr. Falk) a kind of moral revulsion, a mentality of cruelty that denies people, individually and collectively, essential spiritual development. It is the triumph of a material set of values. 4. The victims of this kind of ethic will have to fight back. It would encourage extreme desperate policies by disadvantaged peoples. 5. It overemphasizes population. (Reduction of the ozone content of the upper atmosphere is one of our gravest mistakes, and is the result of technology more than it is of population.) 6. There is no satisfactory accountability of the authority structure to the responsibility structure.

To solve the complicated relationships of the ecological and humanistic imperatives requires radical rejection of the existing order of things and change on all levels of social, political and economic life, a change that will create a system capable of meeting the needs of people and of ecological viability.

There are indications that we are working toward a decentralized order within our national society and also toward an international coordination. There is a tremendous wave of global awareness that did not exist in earlier periods. This gives some grounds for hope alongside of the many grounds for despair.

We seem to be orienting toward a global society around functional issues, not a totalitarian centralized policy but one in which issues are handled separately, regionally and globally and coordinated by, but not dependent on, a great centralized power.

There is a feeling against dominant loyalties to states. Ethnic consciousness is growing in the very parts of the world that have had states for the longest time. The Sepatatist and Quebec movements are partly because the state is failing to supply security and well-being. Therefore its functional justification is being eroded. People are finding both smaller identity and larger identity meet their needs of the present period.

To polarize and utilize these tendencies, we need a revision that grows on their energies and shows that it is possible to do what is desirable. A revision that grows on the notion that hope is needed to achieve change. Not in little institutional innovations, but in a fundamental radical revolution of values that lead to drastic reordering of priorities and procedures in the world. It has to move reform out of the realm of interests and into the realm of values.

Several spiritual movements in the world are encouraging. They sense that underlying the separateness of various cultures and religious traditions is a common affirmation both of the unity of mankind and the essential spiritual character of human potential. I (Dr. Falk) think we have to build on this.

Suit Filed By Consumer Fraud

Attorney General M. Jerome Diamond announced today that his Consumer Fraud Division has filed suit in Washington Superior Court charging the First National food store chain with violating Vermont's Consumer Fraud Law.

The Attorney General accused First National of failing "to have advertised goods available for sale in accordance with the terms of its advertisements." He also accused the supermarket chain of failing "to accurately unit price its goods."

Specifically, the Complaint alleges that First National advertised goods for sale and then did not have some of those goods available in sufficient quantities for consumers who responded to the ads. In some instances, items were ticketed at prices higher than the advertised prices, which meant that consumers who went to First National expecting to pay a certain price for an item either had to pay more or go home without it.

The Complaint also states that these advertising offenses are directly in violation of a consumer fraud regulation and that they were committed after the Consumer Fraud Division had notified First National of the regulation.

The Attorney General's Complaint charges also that First National has not posted the unit price of all applicable goods and that it has posted an inaccurate unit price for certain grocery items with the result that First National customers missed out on some of the economic benefits of unit price comparison shopping.

Attorney General Diamond has requested that the Court order First National to sell advertised items in accordance with the terms of its advertisements, to accurately unit price its goods, to reimburse the State for its costs of investigation, and to pay a civil penalty of $10,000 for each violation of Vermont's Consumer Fraud Law.

The Complaint was filed on October 8, 1975, and recently was served on the Defendant.

Jeffords Opposes Tax Bill

WASHINGTON---US Representative James M. Jeffords, R. Vt., today voted against the "Tax Reform Act of 1975", saying that in its final form, "the bad points outweigh the good." The measure was approved this afternoon, on a vote of 257-168. Jeffords said the bill failed to eliminate "glaring loopholes which exist in the present tax law" and is "almost useless in terms of true tax reform."

He sharply criticized the set of rules which he said prevented action on key revisions which would have improved the bill. Under the rules, only seven amendments, proposed by members of the Ways and Means Committee, were allowed to be discussed on the floor. Jeffords said he particularly objected to a rule which prohibited consideration of an amendment which would have deleted from the bill a new tax break for members of Congress.

The provision, which Jeffords strongly opposes, increases tax deductions for Congressmen, for their expenses in Washington, from $3,000 to more than $7,000 a year. The new tax break is retroactive to the beginning of the current session of Congress.

"I have never voted to increase my own benefits, and I do not intend to do so now," Jeffords commented today. He said any increase in congressional benefits should at least be delayed until the next Congress, to give the voters a chance to express their opinion on the action.

Jeffords also expressed regrets that the House did not attach a limit on federal spending to the tax bill. Such a limit has been called for by President Ford.

"Although I disagree with some of the President's spending priorities, I am in strong agreement that we must put a realistic limit on total, overall spending," Jeffords said. "That is the only feasible way to control expenditures and reduce the danger of a new round of severe inflation." He said he was also disappointed that the House failed to pass an amendment which would have closed real estate loopholes for wealthy individuals. The amendment, sponsored by 14 reform-minded members of the Ways and Means Committee, "would have made the bill far more attractive from the point of view of tax reform," he said. It was defeated by a narrow margin. The Vermont Congressman said he strongly supports the tax relief section of the bill, which simply extends for another year the tax relief which was approved earlier this session. However, he said the tax relief extension "is not only sound, it is also popular. If this bill does not become law, it is safe to predict that the tax relief will be extended, one way or another."

An Energy Review

The end of cheap energy was perceived in the 1950s, but government price controls obscured underlying costs. Research has been to increase supply not to conserve and not on diversity appropriate to different areas.

Five facts characterize the energy and other situations. 1. Institutions depend on rapidly escalating use of resources. Use of nonrenewables is doubling every 15 years. The corporate structure grew, extracting profits from federal bureaucracy regulating the GNP.

2. Limits to continued increase are viewed only from physical aspects which assume that new technology will solve the problems. But social and psychological effects pose a subtle network of constraints. Growth implies larger social units which progressively encroach on the authority of the individual.

25% of gross investment in the US is in energy. When oil was abundant in the US it took $200 of capital material, put in place, to produce one barrel of oil. The same is true in the Middle East now. But today in the US it takes $2,000 and in Alaska $6,000 including pipe line etc., and from oil shale it takes $20,000.

3. Many energy sources are erodable, that is, will yield for a short time fairly constantly then run down. Examples: eroded land, worn-out machinery.

4. Long delays characterize environmental systems. Examples: length of time to bring eroded land back into use. Social attitudes and institutional changes may take from ten to one hundred years.

5. Short term perspective governs institutions responsible for resource decisions which may extend into the next century, yet there is no consideration of their cost-benefits beyond three to five years. Short-term consequences govern the electorate and bureaucracy avoiding short-term embarrassment.

Instability results when these five factors exist. We need to develop institutions to bring us stability and accommodation to the earth's natural limits.

We have developed many institutions but our record is not good. Of at least six multimillion-dollar energy-policy studies in the last three years only one (now discredited) ever even raised the question of a possible steady-state energy system. They concentrated on growth rate. Yet concerned in some way with our energy problems are 33 congressional committees, an Energy Administration, and ERDA with a budget of several billion dollars.

Changes are coming to produce a better dealing with this concept of equilibrium. Over emphasis on material and economic indicators of man's well-being gave a narrow image of his direction. With social indicator techniques we begin to probe for a large variety of ways to measure man's well-being. While there is no way of predicting precisely what will happen in social systems, basic trends, movements and relationships that have momentum let us project them decades into the future.

Forecasting can only tell us what the options are, not what they should be. If we could develop techniques to know what options are possible, 95% of debate time in Congress could be freed for other activities. Put another way, politics, at the moment, is the art of debating which of several impossible outcomes you most prefer.

Oil and gas currently provide 80% of our power and will decline from here on. There are, now forseeable, four ways of dealing with this.

1. Conservation is relatively cheap, fast and innocuous to the environment. Production is relatively expensive, time consuming and tends to emphasize bureaucratic power.

2. Nuclear Power, in my mind, says Dr. Meadows, is both impossible and unacceptable. Impossible because capital requirements and technical failures are too great. Unacceptable because, even if technically safe and cheap, it imposes on the country a centralized technocratic elite with broad responsibility over every aspect of society. It requires, to safeguard waste, a strong increase in garrison-state procedures. I don't find it to be an alternative, he says.

3. Coal, though not perfectly satisfactory, is the best source at the moment.

4. Imports, even if we are willing and able to solve the political and economic problems, will not be available long enough to solve our energy problems. (The biggest favor OPEC ever did us was to arouse us to face our problems in 1973 instead of waiting another decade till their reserves begin to dwindle.)

5. Solar, wind, water geothermal and fusion may be extremely important, but our energy situation is, never the less, going to deteriorate steadily for the next ten years at least.

The cost of energy will double or triple in relation to other goods and services. If lucky, we can stabilize energy use at something like 20 to 40% above present levels.

After three years of endeavors with Washington, Dr. Meadows concludes that the diffused set of interests between lobbyists, executive branch and Congress make it impossible to put together there a long-term plan with its necessary short-term costs.

Initiative has to be seized at the regional level. Though this may not be possible either, Dr. Meadows quoted the following: "Radical change is facilitated in a political body with a set of goals and values more or less equally shared among the constituents. The greater the diversity of goals and values the more difficult it is for the democratic assembly to choose for itself a radical departure from the status quo."

In New England, and particularly in Vermont, there are available resources and internal consistency sufficient to imagine striking out with a new policy. We in New England can now envision solutions to bring us reliable sustained energy. Needed are a large number of small-term changes, each of which is, in itself, trivial but effective, and implemented by an individual who realizes that his participation is required. Any place in this country that could bring this off is New England.

And so on. The question is "What is new?" Where is the news upon which we all thrive? Something must be happening among all this interaction and confusion. Where is the next conspiracy? Where have all the scandals gone? Who is being raped, robbed, and cheated, and by whom?

Is everyone "good" or is there really "nothing" new? Or have we become blind to those things which don't affect us directly?

Why am I here? How am I going to get finished? Where is my goddamn hat? What time is it? Do you like new news or does new news bore you? Are you a bore? Do you have anything to offer?

Who are you? Do I know you? Do you think? Are you bored? Are you lazy? Are you a slob? Are you disenchanted? Do you hate it?

Are you busy? Are you horny? Are you really horny? Are you frustrated? Is Freud right? Are you easy? Are you drunk? Or are you easy when you're drunk?

Happy New Year

UVM St

by Wendy Pierro

In September, interim President Wayne C. Patterson projected a tuition increase of 7 percent for students, at the University of Vermont.

That 7 percent tuition increase was scaled to be from 10-12 percent by President Patterson, at the Board of Trustees meeting, December 6.

The 7 percent increase would be a hike of $80.00 more per semester for instate students, and $210.00 for out-of-staters.

The jump in tuition would depend upon what the state appropriation will be for the coming year.

The state has already impounded $100,000 from UVM. The University has requested a $500,000 increase in funding from the state, a request that doesn't look very promising.

President Patterson said the only way to eat UVM's budget would be to raise the tuition and room and board fee on campus.

Dormitory rates would go up $76.00, and an increase in meals was proposed to go up $50.00 per student.

The cost for a double room would rise from $736 to $812 per year, and from $796 to $872 per year for a single room.

With such a measurable increase in the costs to live on

UVM Students To Pay More

Dormitory rates would go up $76.00, and an increase in meals was proposed to go up $50.00 per student.

The cost for a double room would rise from $736 to $812 per year, and from $796 to $872 per year for a single room.

With such a measurable increase in the costs to live on campus, it looks like it would be cheaper for students to live off campus, if they can find an apartment.

The trustees also approved $500,000 in budget cuts from UVM that would eliminate some full-and part-time positions, in the administrative and academic departments.

Eight full-time nontenured faculty positions will be cut from UVM, five spaces which are now empty. Six other jobs will be cut from nonfaculty profesional positions.

Ten positions would be eliminated from the administrative and service departments.

Academic Vice President Rollins said that these cuts had been made in consultation with the deans and directors in each department.

"The budget cuts will be made to reduce the $1.2 million deficit projected for UVM's fiscal year 1977, beginning July 1," said President Patterson.

President Patterson said the University would be in a better position to estimate its needs by the February board meeting, when the level of state funding would be less uncertain.

Trustee Kenneth Scott proposed a motion to end co-ed dorms, and limit visiting to first floor lounges. Mr. Scott said the alumni as well as citizens of Vermont, and other states had expressed their concern to him about the co-ed issue. The Student Activities Committee voted to table this matter until the February trustee meeting.

With the budget cuts hitting students and employees, will the quality of education also be affected at UVM? Just from a look at the Spring selection of courses, there seems to be less numbers of courses to choose from each semester. What will be cut next?

Trustees Support VPIRG Funding System

After two days of intense debate, the University of Vermont trustees voted Saturday to support the VPIRG student referendum. The vote followed a last ditch attempt by two members of the board to end the present funding arrangement between the student-run research group and the University.

The board resolution allows VPIRG to keep the present funding system but to clarify the wording concerning the option. Former State Senator Madeline Harwood and Kenneth Scott, the retired vice president of the General Motors Corporation, tried to change the billing procedures to a "positive-checkoff" system. At present, students are billed $3.00 per semester but may waive payment of the fee at the time of initial billing or request a refund. Under the proposal backed by Mrs. Harwood and Scott, students would be required to add three dollars in addition to their total student fees.

According to VPIRG student leaders this change would seriously threaten the financial stability of the lobby group. "The real issue is the right of students to support an effective organization," said John King, VPIRG President. "The students voted overwhelmingly by a 9:1 margin to support VPIRG under the present funding arrangement," he added.

At the Friday meeting of the Student Activities Committee, Scott had tried to eliminate VPIRG as he proposed ending all ties between the student group and the University. His proposal was supported by Mrs. Harwood and State Rep. John Morgan, R-Woodstock, but was defeated by the committee 7-3. Scott's proposal was replaced by a motion from State Rep. Louise Swainbank, R-St. Johnsbury, that would allow the present funding system providing that the option is clearly explained.

Saturday, when the committee resolution came before the full board, Mrs. Harwood and Scott tried to argue that the purpose of the resolution had been aimed at establishing a "positive checkoff" system. Coming to VPIRG's aid were Carl Reidel, the head of the Environmental Program, Staige Davis, the Student Association President, and the UVM Administration, represented by Keith Miser and acting president Wayne Patterson.

Reidel argued that Friday's resolution had simply been to continue the traditional method of collection. Harwood countered Reidel saying that the students had voted to support the present funding system but that they had not necessarily voted to support the negative option. Reidel pointed out, however, that although Mrs. Harwood had read the student referendum question to the full board, she had eliminated the section explaining the funding which clearly proves that the students voted to support the present collection method.

SA President Davis had pointed out during the Friday meeting that VPIRG vote was a large turnout and a strong show of support. Davis also argued that the Friday resolution was simply to clarify the present option.

Trustee Scott threatened to force the board to accept the positive checkoff, but the VPIRG funding was saved by a quick call for the original resolution from former State Senator Robert Boardman. Boardman called the discussion "much ado about nothing."

The resolution was passed on a voice vote and said: "Be it resolved that the university continue to support the current policy of collection of the VPIRG fee as directed in the board of trustees resolution of December 4, 1971, and that the UVM administration is directed to make clear to students in a straight-forward and open manner their option not to pay that fee and that failure to pay will in no way effect their enrollment."

Library And Gym Expansions Held Up Due To Cost

by Paul Ajamian

The library and physical education expansion projects have been approved, but construction will not begin until ways are found to alleviate the cost to students.

UVM's Board of Trustees met last Thursday and Friday, Dec. 5 and 6, and came to this decision in what was one of the most important sessions ever in terms of impact on students.

In the way of background information, both projects have been in the planning stage for several years. Extensive research has been done as to the amount that each facility is currently used, and in what areas expansion would best benefit students.

The Bailey Library was built for a maximum of 4,000 students, with the current enrollment figure at least twice that. There are presently only 860 seats for studying, and extremely inadequate shelf space for the number of volumes owned. The proposed addition, at an estimated cost of 5.9 million dollars, would extend towards the bookstore and would approximately double the existing space. Study areas would increase significantly, as would shelves and the resulting selection of books. This represents a vast improvement over present conditions, which as anyone who uses the library knows are intolerable.

As far as the gym and related facilities are concerned, these again were built with only 4,000 students in mind. In addition, the facility was built primarily for men. This has resulted in the current critical shortage of women's locker space and recreational areas. Based on the many needs, a list of priority items was established. This included upgrading facilities for women, additional classroom and office space, improvement to Gutterson fieldhouse, twelve more handball and squash courts, and a combination tennis-gymnastic building. It was felt that these and other improvements would enable UVM to regain its competitive status in the phys. ed. area, and adequately serve the increasing needs of all students. The total cost of this project would be about 3.2 million dollars.

The next question, after all these facts were gathered, was of course who would pay for it. The state cannot be counted on, at least at the present time, due to their financial woes. A university-wide capital fund drive is a possible source, but would take several years before results were seen. That, naturally, leaves the average UVM students as the only source of funds in the immediate future.

Cost per student for both projects would total approximately $115.00, this being reflected in increases in the Library and Athletic Bond fees.

The Student Association, at a recent campus-wide General Assembly meeting, asked for student feelings on the increased fees and accompanying facility improvements. On a question similiar to the motion the trustees approved last week, students present voiced their support for the expansions contingent upon the final financial arrangements.

With this very much in mind, members of the Student Action Committee of S.A. looked at the $115.00 total fee increase in light of other projected increases presented to the trustees. With tuition, room, and board skyrocketing, it was decided that the additional library and athletic costs cannot be borne solely by students.

Getting back to the trustees, a motion was made by Interim President Patterson that was discussed Friday and voted upon favorably on Saturday. The motion gave full support to the two projects, but holds up any ground-breaking plans until alternative methods of financing are investigated. He expressed confidence that more than half of the 9.1 million dollars (total cost for the two proposals) could be raised from other sources, and thus significantly reduce the fee increases.

The future will hopefully be brighter for the implementation of these much needed additions.

Jobs In Question

by Daniel B. Haslam

Burlington – The future of at least four top-level University of Vermont administrators probably won't be known until the president-elect arrives on campus early next July, according to a UVM spokesman.

Dr. Robert Stanfield, executive assistant to interim president Dr. Wayne Patterson, said in an interview that the interim status of several top university officials would remain in a "hold situation" until Dr. Lattie Coor, the new president of the university, has had an opportunity to evaluate his top-level staff.

Stanfield said that a "very, very wide range of options" exists for Coor in a restructuring of the administration, and he added that "at least one individual...would have to evacuate, and that would be Wayne Patterson."

Dr. Patterson, who has been acting president since July 1 of this year, technically has the option of resuming his former job as executive vice president, now held on an interim basis by Dr. Richard Powers. Patterson's exercise of this option, however, conceivably could create a "domino effect" and a number of "temporarily" elevated administrators scrambling for their prior positions in the event their interim status is ended. Positions which could be affected in this manner range from the presidency down to the office of registrar and include at least four men who have moved up the administrative ladder since Dr. Edward C. Andrews stepped down as president on June 30.

Stanfield would not speculate on Dr. Patterson's intentions, but said that Patterson had personally visited Dr. Coor recently to discuss administrative changes. He said that the discussions dealt only with general administrative policies which may be an indication that Patterson himself may be in the dark concerning his tenure at the university.

Patterson stands to take a salary cut of nearly 20 per cent should he decide to remain at UVM as executive vice president and would take an even greater cut should he return to a teaching position with the university. As interim president he receives $43,000 a year, plus residence in the president's mansion, Englesby House, and a university-owned automobile.

In discussing possible administrative changes at UVM, Stanfield pointed out that Coor has within his power the ability to make a "clean sweep" of all top executives at the university. However, Stanfield said that "It's not clear that he (Coor) would do this," nor does he feel that "the president-elect will close his options early in a shuffle of the administration."

Most administrators at UVM have a form of job security, Stanfield said, since many are tenured members of the faculty and are assured of a job should they find themselves without a slot in Coor's administration. However, like Patterson, most executives on "presidential row" in the Waterman building at UVM may have to await the arrival of the new boss before they will know where they stand in the next administration.

Peddlers Create European Air On Church Street

by Wendy Pierro

One finds a "touch of European air on Church Street resembling an outside market place. Peddlers sell a fine assortment of homemade crafts including a selection of leather goods, pottery, candles, silver jewelry, and wooden toys.

The Church Street peddlers are a total of 31 people who have obtained licenses from City Hall, lasting until the second week in May.

The number of peddlers selling their wares has decreased due to the bitting temperatures in Burlington. Friday, I found only three peddlers out on the sidewalks. I stopped to talk to the hot dog lady, Louis Bodoky. Louis was prepared for cold weather, bundled up in a down ski outfit, behind her cart of "Lojos Yum Yums," big cookies and hotdogs. I bought a sauerkraut and cheese dog, while people stopped to buy something. Louis sells from 50 to 150 hotdogs a day. She says "the best traffic of people is on the side of Church Street across from Woolworth's, near the bank.

Louis runs a beauty salon part-time, and now has a hotdog cart up on UVM's campus. She pays a percentage to SAGA, but the food is still hers, not SAGA's. The hotdog was really tasty, and I munched out on an oatmeal raisin cookie and hot chocolate. Yum it was.

I moved on to a person selling pottery from a car. She said, "depending upon who is a policeman, and the time of day, I will have to move my car." Police force peddlers working out of their cars to move every hour to a new space, according to the city's parking rules.

Downtown merchants have requested that no more peddling licenses be issued, but peddlers have said they want licenses available to all peddlers through free enterprise.

"I would like to see as many people as want to get a license, and let the regular economic forces survive on their own," said Dave Furlong. Dave, a student at UVM, and a Church Street peddler since last year, sells wooden toys in front of Woolworth's.

Local merchants fear the competition, and the "carnival" type atmosphere created by the peddlers. The town ordinance committee will adopt a new ordinance on the peddlers by January 1. The merchants would like to have no peddlers' licenses issued with cars, but the peddlers have asked for 10 spaces alloted on Church Street on a first come, first serve basis to the peddlers.

The old ordinance is extremely outdated, including talk of horse and buggy drawn carts. The cost is $5 for a peddler's license on foot, and $15 for those with cars. This is a cheap fee and, along with the revised ordinance, the price for a peddler's license will probably rise.

Two Church Street peddlers have moved into the Christmas Craft's Market, on Center Street to sell their crafts. "From a craftsman's point of view, I have never seen a person get rich selling their goods. I do it to get by, and, because my things are handmade, I sell a bit of myself along with it," said Marie Colbert. Marie sells copper enamels and gem stones at the Craft's Market.

Friday and Saturday were long days for me. I got a little Xmas shopping done, and was amazed to see the peddlers out on Saturday in the rain and snow. A few peddlers will stick it out during the holiday, and make a cold, but worthwhile profit.

What Goes In:

Fitness Is Life

by Ginny Theall and Ginny Sickles
L/L Nutrition Program

In 1890, a sedentary individual was a clerk who woke up at the crack of dawn, split wood or shoveled coal for an hour, walked to work for almost an hour, worked 10 hours daily, 6 days a week at a stand-up desk, walked home for another hour, split wood or shoveled coal again, and on Sunday took his family for a 3 or 4 hour walk. Today's "active" individual wakes to an alarm clock, gulps down a cup of coffee and a piece of toast, drives the car to the office in more time than it would take to walk, sits behind a desk for 4-8 hours, depending on the number of coffee breaks, drives back home, converses with the family from behind a newspaper, eats the biggest meal of the day, and then watches 2-3 hours of television before retiring. His exercise consists of walking in and out of a golf cart on the weekends. It is ironic that we have mechanized our lives so perfectly that not only do we not work for a living, we aren't living. Heart disease is the number one killer in America and one of the factors is our gross lack of physical fitness. The only comparison to the active person of 1890 is today's vigorous athlete whose life is directed toward physical training.

Physical fitness used to be a vague term for the state of one's physical health. Today, the best measure of physical fitness is called oxygen consumption. Oxygen consumption is the ability to take in, transport and utilize oxygen for muscular work. High consumption equals good physical fitness and low oxygen consumption means poor physical fitness. Most children are active in daily play and activities, so that their bodies are physically fit and their oxygen consumption is high. Puberty arrives and signals the girls to climb down from the trees and directs boys' energies into competitive athletics if they can "make the team". Overall daily activity is reduced to a minimum. High school gym classes are what nightmares are made of if you were consistently forgotten when the teams were chosen.

Physical education is a thing of the past for most upperclassmen in college. A study of Finnish college students in 1966 demonstrated that 300 freshmen exhibited, on the average, lower oxygen consumption, hence were less physically fit, than normal.

The statistics of coronary heart disease are grim. Adult males in 26 countries have a longer life expectancy than in America. The incidence of coronary heart disease in America is 4½ times that of Sweden. The Framingham, Massachusetts, study showed that today's sedentary individual has a five times greater chance of a fatal heart attack than the active individual. The American male has one chance in five of experiencing a heart attack before age 60 and a one in four chance of dying within 3 hours during the first attack. Women are not immune to heart attacks, either. More women are living the same sedentary, stressful lifestyles as men; more women are dying of some form of heart disease. Though there are many factors involved in heart disease risk (heredity, smoking, high blood pressure, diet, atherosclerosis, obesity, diabetes), exercise or lack of it is one of the factors that can

Jimm

Vermont supporters of Democratic Presidential candidate Jimmy Carter are making final preparations for a fundraising dinner in Ludlow on Wednesday, December 17.

State Senator John Alden of Woodstock, Vermont has announced that Carter, the former Governor of Georgia, will speak at the dinner. Said Alden, "As the State Senator from Windsor County I'm honored that the next Pyesident of the United States will be speaking in Ludlow."

The event will consist of a $10-a-plate dinner at the National Guard Armory at 37 Main Street. The social hour begins at 6:00 p.m.; dinner will be served at 7:00 p.m.

Senator Alden said he expects all 250 seats at the Armory to be filled for the December 17 event. Tickets are available from: State Senator Esther Sorrell, Burlington; State Senator John Alden, Woodstock; State Rep. John Murphy, Ludlow; State Rep. Will Hunter, Weathersfield. Members of the Democratic Town Committees in Ludlow, Weathersfield and Cavendish.

Tickets will also be available at the door, but said Senator Sorrell, Vermont Carter Co-chairperson, "We'd like those intending to go to the dinner to contact us in advance."

Children

The VCM is a forum which Vermont children can express their creative energies and be able to share their ideas with other children in the state. Children have sent in magazine poems, short stories, essays on pollution, other project reports, and other material, all of which has exhibited an amazing quality of thought and feeling. The efforts merit continued exposure, and this is what the magazine is for, with kids all over Vermont sharing their common interests, heritage and culture.

At the moment, the magazine is between its first and second issues. This past spring, a corps of 15 student writers, artists, and other volunteers, spent an intensive weeks preparing the first issue. The final result was published in May.

The magazine staff had hoped to publish the second issue of the magazine this fall using a subscription system to pay for the cost of printing, etc. At four issues per school year, the subscription cost for each child receiving a copy would be between 15-20 cents per issue. Unfortunately, many principals of the schools have been cautious about extending their support. There are 200 schools in the state which have been contacted by the magazine staff, with only one school receiving a copy of the magazine and the full financial details of the subscription program. So far, only about 30 have indicated they want to be involved on that basis.

Far from being discouraged, the staff of the magazine realize that in many of the schools, only the principal sees the magazine, and if he or she did not pass it on to teachers, there is no way in which the children or their parents around the state could learn about the magazine. Therefore, the staff is going ahead with plans to prepare the second issue of the magazine, and seeking funds to finance it. Coupled with an extensive publicity campaign, this second issue will determine whether there is enough interest in the magazine to continue this worthy project.

Controversy Over The Pill's Hazards

by Cynthia Crossen

(CPS)--Just one little pill a day and the chances of becoming pregnant are reduced to practically nothing. Millions of American women find the easy, sure-fire birth control pill the long-awaited answer to all their contraceptive complaints.

But in the past few years, the pill's reputation for unpleasant side effects and suspected health hazards has been driving more college women back to the old alternatives--the diaphragm, the IUD and condoms.

At most university health services, the pill is still the most frequently requested contraceptive but increases have been noted in requests for other methods. In many cases, women are encouraged by the college physician to consider the alternatives because of the shortage of verifiable information about the pill's long-range effects. One woman studying the pill at Columbia University has called the pill a "grand and unprecedented biological experiment."

"It's amazing" how many women take the pill because everybody else does, Dr. Manson Fee, gynecologist at Iowa State University said. But "when you give a female of this age group (college) a potent combination of synthetic hormones, it can't do any good," Fee added.

The synthetic hormones, estrogen and progestin, are not "natural" hormones that the body produces anyway, according to New York gynecologist Harold Speert. "It was not the honest thing to do to call these hormones estrogens and progestins."

Speert argued. "They should be given chemical names like those they use in the petroleum industry, of which they are more deserving."

"A lot of women who wouldn't want to be taking some petroleum-type chemical into their bodies every day, are willing to take something that sounds as though their bodies are producing it," he said.

Intensive research on the pill has produced suspected links with several incurable diseases including cancer, diabetes, strokes and heart disease. But advocates of the pill insist that the studies have been inconclusive so far and point to their own statistics which give the pill a fairly clean bill of health.

Unfortunately, those studies have only been underway since the pill's American debut only 16 years ago and the long-range effects are still unknown. An assistant professor of medicine at the Harvard Medical School said the studies done in the early sixties which approved of the hormone drug were based on a very small number (100-200) of persons who had been taking the pill for a year or more.

The consumers of the pill haven't been getting much advice on the hazards and side effects from either the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) which regulates the pill or the manufacturers themselves. Iowa gynecologist Fee pointed out that pill manufacturers are very careful to downplay the hazards of birth control pills in their promotional literature. The only harmful effect most of them mention is blood clots.

Even if a student is aware of the possible side effects, her attitude is often "that could never happen to me," Fee said.

But according to the coordinator of gynecological services at the University of Pennsylvania, more women there are being scared away from the pill by reports of weight gain, emotional stress and bleeding disturbances.

Other possible side effects of the pill range from skin problems to migraine headaches to rashes, fatigue, depression and cramps. And recently even the FDA admitted that the pill might make some women more susceptible to venereal disease. Although the FDA hedged on requiring manufacturers to warn women of a possible pill-VD link, they did order them to say on the warning label that the pill would do nothing to prevent or treat venereal disease.

The pill greatly lessens a woman's natural immunity to vaginal infection and disease.

Fee claimed, by changing the vagina from acidic to alkaline which enhances bacterial growth.

A woman has the right to make her own decision, but she ought to know what she's gambling with, he added. "It's easy to swallow a pill, but you have to remember you're swallowing a harmful substance."

Merry Christmas America

by Appleton King

It is that time of year again when tinsle, mistletoe, and plastic Santas appear in the shop windows luring price-wary consumers in to stock up for the massive exchange of material goods, which in America is known as Christmas. It's a very special time of year for corporate leaders to gather in small, intimate groups and reap the profits of their insidious advertising techniques. Yet this capitalist feast leaves many without the gifts they really deserve. To that end, I would like to supplement their holidays with these gratifying presents:

To NELSON ROCKEFELLER: a play entitled How to Succeed the President Without Really Trying.

To JERRY FORD: a cloth engraving of New York City which doubles as a snot rag.

To EXXON: Cost in their government spending stocking.

To SOUTH VIETNAM: a get well card and an apology for our absence this year.

To MONDAY NIGHT FOOTBALL FANS: a chance to watch Howard Cosell play left guard against the Los Angeles Rams.

To BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN: a bit of advice, quit while you're ahead.

To CONGRESS: a wheelbarrow full of "No-Doze."

To DONALD RUMSFELD: G.I. Joe action-pack set with accessories.

To BEIRUT, LEBANON: a Hilton hotel with bull's eyes painted on the windows.

To MULTI-NATIONAL CORPORATIONS: a guide to undeveloped countries.

To N.O.W.: a year's subscription to Playgirl.

To EUELL GIBBONS: a bag of psilocibian mushrooms.

To INFLATION: massive tax cuts and excessive government spending.

To RONALD REAGAN: a swimming pool filled from the fountain of youth.

To PATTY HEARST: a slap on the wrist for being a bad girl this year.

To F. LEE BAILEY: whatever Patty's father hasn't already given him.

To the STRIPMINING COMPANIES: Yellowstone Park and a stretch of prime Oregon seascape.

To "BIG DADDY" IDI AMIN: a full size poster of Atilla the Hun.

To PAT NIXON: a diamond studded leash and a pair of earplugs.

To HENRY KISSINGER: for public addresses a book entitled How to Perfect the Art of Double-talk and for presidential speeches Ventriloquism Made Easy.

To INDIRA GANDHI: a year's supply of balls and chains.

And finally, to the FORD ADMINISTRATION and the GOVERNMENT OF SOVIET RUSSIA: a chance to fight it out once and for all with B-B guns on a desert isle.

New Vermont Children's Magazine

The VCM is a forum in which Vermont children can express their creative energies, and be able to share their ideas with other children in the state. Children have sent the magazine poems, short stories, essays on pollution, class project reports, and other material, all of which have exhibited an amazing quality of thought and feeling. These efforts merit continued exposure, and this is what the magazine is for, with kids all over Vermont sharing their common interests, heritage, and culture.

At the moment, the magazine is between its first and second issues. This past spring, a corps of 15 students, writers, artists, and other volunteers, spent an intensive 6 weeks preparing the first issue. The final result was published in May.

The magazine staff had hoped to publish the second issue of the magazine this fall, using a subscription system to pay for the cost of printing, etc. At four issues per school year, the subscription cost to each child receiving a copy would be between 15-20 cents per issue. Unfortunately, the principals of the schools have been cautious about extending their support. There are 281 schools in the state which have been contacted by the magazine staff, with each school receiving a copy of the magazine and the full financial details of the subscription program. So far, only about 3% have indicated they want to get involved on that basis.

Far from being discouraged, the staff of the magazine realize that in many of these schools, only the principal saw the magazine, and if he or she did not pass it on to teachers, there is no way in which children or their parents around the state could know about the magazine. Therefore, the staff is going ahead with plans to prepare the second issue of the magazine, and raise funds to finance it. Coupled with an extensive publicity campaign, this second issue will determine whether there is enough interest in the state to continue this worthy project.

In order to stand a chance of pulling this off, the VCM staff needs your help! At this moment, the staff is a skeleton organization. In order to do all the work needed (solicitation and editing of material, artwork, layout, coordination with Printers, publicity, fund-raising, etc.) the staff needs to multiply significantly in the next few months. It needs people who are interested in children, and with interest and/or background in: publicity and public relations, magazine production (layout, artwork, etc.), finances, (the magazine needs a qualified treasurer, as well as people interested in fund-raising), organization (the magazine is in the process of becoming a non-profit organization, and needs people familiar with the same), grant writing, coordination with the school system.

The key here is interest, not skill. Also, students should consider the possibility of negotiating with their department for credit. The big things right now are preparing the second issue and raising some cash. There will be a benefit concert at the Sting, to be held the first week of February. Besides a cover charge, there will be a raffle for door prizes, Tee-shirts with the magazine emblem will be sold, and an information/-recruitment booth will be set up. These projects need volunteer help to get the Concert rolling and the magazine steamrolling.

The magazine's next meeting is December 15. It will be a short meeting, primarily designed to recruit more staff and elect officers. The meeting will be at 7 p.m., December 15, room 409, Waterman Building, UVM.

If you feel like finding out more about the magazine before the 15th, or if you can't make this meeting but are interested, contact: Louisa Beinecke, 132 Colchester Avenue, 864-6731, or Charles Campbell, Mt. St. Mary's Convent, 863-6835, or Edward Osborn, c/o Pomeroy Hall, UVM 656-3214, or c/o E.T.V. (on Tues. and Thurs), 656-3311.

Over Vacation Security

by Susan Sprague

When you are packing up to go home for winter break, don't forget your toothbrush. The dorms will be locked tight, and admittance to them will be difficult to obtain. These are the sentiments of Bill Ballard of the Residential Life Office and Sgt. Peters of Campus Security.

Security over vacation will be tight, with officers checking the dorms daily, but it is left to the discretion of the students as to whether they should leave stereos, televisions, and other appliances in their rooms. Peters said that she would recommend that students take such items home. She said that locking items in closets and trunks is not always effective. Ballard echoed her sentiments, saying that certain security measures are taken against theft, but dormitories are a temptation.

When asked to elaborate on what measures are being taken to protect university property, Ballard said that he could not say much, but everything possible is being done. He explained that the effectiveness of the security systems relied on their secrecy. He did say that locks on dorms where students have keys to outside doors are all changed, the housekeeping staff is moved from place to place during the break so that the buildings will have people in them from time to time, and that resident advisers and area coordinators often stay in their respective living quarters, further discouraging intruders.

Ballard said that there will be a very limited number of people allowed to stay in the dorms, and that those people would be consolidated into a small area, such as a portion of the Living/Learning Center. The heat is turned down, and hot water is off in most buildings during this time.

Should students need to get into their rooms during break, they must go to the Residential Life Office and discuss their reason for admittance with the staff there. It must be an important issue, or the student will not be allowed to enter the dorms. If the student is allowed to enter, it will be at the convenience of the staff at Residential Life, as they are short-handed during vacations, and the student's area coordinator will be contacted to make a positive identification of the student. Students will then be accompanied to their room by a staff member.

Ballard asked that students carefully follow the check list given to them by their resident assistants during the final week of the semester. This list includes unplugging all appliances, sweeping the room, pulling down the window shades, and locking the door. Ballard also asked that students make arrangements for plants to be taken care of because the housekeeping staff will not be able to do this for the students.

Christmas Origins And Ironies

by Scott Curtis

It is ironic but true that most holidays have celebrations that do not coincide with the origin of the holiday. Christmas is no exception. The very day of the celebration, December 25, is a source of confusion. Most scholars are certain that Jesus' birth could not have taken place in the winter months. The year 336 is the earliest record of Christmas being celebrated on December 25th.

This day was a pagan holiday for Rome – Natalis Solis Invicti – Birthday of the unconquerable Sun. The sun god was Mithras, and in the year 274, Mithraism was declared their official state religion. The church fought to keep a holy celebration of a Christian holiday. Yet, as late as 1000, the Christian message still competed against Mithraic influences.

Today, Christmas is America's most commercial holiday. This certainly contradicts part of Christ's message, which is to seek God's Kingdom first, and not to be hot and bothered about material possessions. Santa Claus, the bearer of all the gifts, is considerably different from his progenitor. St. Nicholas, a 4th Century bishop, was a generous man who reportedly gave gifts to the children who knew their catechism. The bishop's vestments were red and white, and he had a beard. His current name descended from the Dutch "Sinterklaas," a form of "Sint Nikolaas."

The most subtle, and indeed the most significant irony of Christmas revolves around the more religious celebrations. Since the world has never sought holiness, its holidays will always have 'pagan' influences. The customs dressed in a holy garb are more deceiving, and therefore more disturbing.

Christmas is the leading Christian holiday. The Church portrays the picture of the baby Jesus in a manger, with Mary and Joseph and the shepherds and the wise men gathered around. A beautiful chorus of angelic music accompanies the scene. No one can be disturbed by this scene, and churches are packed out on Christmas Eve.

This event of God becoming man carries much significance, but it often misses the mark. The myth of Jesus being harmless, 'meek and mild,' is focused on and magnified, distorting the complete view of the Christ. Jesus boldly proclaimed the truth of his being God's most important prophet and His only Son. Jesus stated, "Heaven and Earth will pass away, but my words will not pass away." This is not included in the popular view of Jesus' humility. Instead of emphasizing the need for people to submit totally to the Lord Jesus Christ, Christmas has people putting away the baby Jesus to "sleep in heavenly peace."

In sum, the focus on the birth of Jesus is misleading. In fact, two gospel writers, Mark and John, do not mention the Christmas story. All the gospels put considerable emphasis on the death of Jesus Christ. They believed that attention should be turned to the miracle of the holy God becoming man to suffer and die for the sins of every human being.

Though that cash value is included in the benefits given to your survivors when you die, that money could be building up interest in a regular savings account in a bank.

The same amount of actual coverage that you pay for in your whole life policy would cost less in a term policy, since you are not paying for any cash value. By buying a whole life insurance policy early, you lose the interest you might have had if you had bought a term policy and put the difference between the term policy and the whole life policy in a savings account where it could earn you interest.

Clear? Each year's lost interest that you might have earned must be added to your premium to show what that policy really cost you that year.

In other words: You actually pay more each year for less protection.

Students have still another catch to worry about: the "promissory note" or loan.

For only a token down payment, $10 perhaps, a student can take out $15,000 in insurance. But what he has actually done is taken out a loan for the rest of that year's premium – let's say $255. He has signed a promissory note.

That student has five years to pay off that promissory note – at 8% interest. At the end of five years, the original $255 loan plus the interest may amount to about $375. Now it is time to pay. Part of this sum is subtracted from his cash value (the savings account part of his policy, which has built up). The rest of it comes from his pocket. Remember, however, that he also has that year's premium – $265 – to pay. He has been paying that sum every year since that first $10 down payment.

What if, over that five-year period, the student has had economic trouble? The times, as we all know, are tough. Ph.D.'s are driving cabs. If at any time during that five-year period that student has not been able to pay his $265 premium, his promissory note (plus interest up to that point) automatically becomes due. Now he has another $265 – at least – slapped on him.

To break through all this tangled terminology, then, here are several points to remember about campus life insurance:

– If you have no one financially dependent on you, you probably don't need it.

– If you do want life insurance, a "term" policy holds the least expense for someone just out of college and financially unstable, with the least tangling committments.

– A "whole life" insurance policy offers you a steady, unchanging premium for your whole life (up to 65, usually), but actually costs you more each year because of the "cash value." If the cash value were put aside in a separate savings account in a bank, it would be earning you interest.

– A tempting negligible down payment may actually commit you to pay a much larger amount every year after that, plus a hefty loan – with interest – that threatens to become due as soon as you miss a regular payment. Sign a promissory note and you are asking for a long-term debt. If you want the policy but can't make the first year's payment in full, then don't sign it.

Not all insurance agents are slick and unethical. But if you are thinking about insurance, be careful. Know exactly what you are signing. Do not be pushed into anything. If you have any problems or questions, contact your state insurance commission. A very useful shopper's guide on campus life insurance is provided by Consumer News in Washington, D.C.

...Fitness Is Life

be manipulated by the individual.

The benefits of regular exercise are many. Exercise strengthens and even multiplies the blood vessels around the heart so that in case of a heart attack, there is more chance of survival and recovery is better. Exercise increases oxygen consumption which leads to greater lung capacity and helps to protect the lungs against diseases such as emphysema. Playing tennis, swimming, running, bicycling——all can provide a good outlet for tension. Physical strength is increased with regular exercise as well as an overall improvement in posture. Physiologically, a person "changes fuel" with regular exercise. Glycogen is the storage form of glucose, found within muscle and liver tissue. With exercise, the muscle reserves of glycogen are increased while at the same time, a higher proportion of the fuel for vigorous work is derived from fat stored in the body. It is thus possible to complete a heavy day's work before all of the stored glucose has been exhausted and the individual will not feel as tired during the normal, non-exercising part of the day.

Exercising improves thermoregulation of the body. Heavy exercising causes the body temperature to rise so that heat must be lost to the environment. The fit person sweats earlier and in greater quantities so that heat is lost through evaporation. The salt content of the sweat decreases with conditioning as well. A fit person is less liable to have difficulties with salt depletion if working for long periods in a hot environment. At a given workload, less blood is directed to the skin for cooling and more blood goes to the muscles under stress. A fatiguing build-up of lactate (a waste product from the chemical reactions within the cells that provide the fuel and energy for work) is avoided and the glycogen supply is not depleted so rapidly. The tone of the veins is improved as well, increasing the overall efficiency of heart and lungs. By expending some 2000 extra heart beats during 15-20 minutes of vigorous exercise, one can save 10-30,000 extra beats over the remainder of the day, lowering the resting pulse from 85 to 65 beats per minute. The time required to run a mile may be cut from 12 to 8 minutes.

Does this sound like magic? It is not. Do not try to correct 10 or 20 years of neglect overnight. Do have a physical examination before engaging in any exercise program. Wild claims of "fitness in 60 seconds a day" are worthless; they may strengthen a few prominent muscles but they do nothing to improve vital capacity or cardio-respiratory function. The major goals of an adult physical fitness program should be stronger and slower heart action, increased breathing capacity, improved stamina, and reduced weight to some extent. Although exercise does stimulate appetite, it stimulates it only to the point of need whereas idleness tends to stimulate appetite above need.

Exercise activities should include about five minutes of warming up to loosen muscles and prepare the heart and lungs for greater exertion. These can include twisting, turning, stretching, bending movements.. Eight to ten minutes of conditioning exercises are needed to improve and strengthen muscle tone which can include sit-ups, push-ups, pull-ups or other activities to get at major muscle groups (arms, legs, back, and trunk). Endurance activities should include enough jogging, running, cycling, swimming, rowing, or other activities to accelerate the action of heart and lungs for at least 30 minutes. These are the most vital exercises for health.

Our lifestyles and society have trained us to be talkers and thinkers but not doers. We frown on physical activity, especially for women. We equate physical activity with competitive sports, often turning many non-competitive individuals away from improving themselves. Physical activity should be as much a habit of our lives as watching television has become for many.

An unidentified author sums up the benefits of physical fitness:

"A whole new world of feeling awaits us when we learn the language of our bodies. Once we become truly acquainted with ourselves, our old patterns of mental and physical behavior begin to dissolve into a less rigid, less inhibited feeling for life. We awaken our body sensations. We experience new intensities of emotion and by reacting to situations in deeper, more pervasive, more personal ways, in a very real sense, we bring ourselves to life." (Harper's Bazaar, April 1970) –

sparkly blue eyes. I looked around her apartment. There was a guy sitting at a dinner table with his arm around a girl. She had long blond hair down to her ass. They turned around to greet the pizza. Instead I greeted the girl with my eyes. She failed to respond.

The woman gave me 8 bucks. That was for the pizzas plus an 80 cent tip. In back of her was a portrait of Jesus on the cross. The guy at the table had on a paisley shirt. I took the money and ran.

Some kids had gathered around my trike. They were looking inside it, and fiddling with the hot box. "Watch out!" I screamed. "That thing is dangerous. Don't touch that box. THE HELIUM FLASH!!"

They backed off when I said that. I got in and gunned off down the street. Who was that masked man?

Pizzas, pizzas, pizzas. I was learning a new side of the industry. People actually ate this slop. They sat around waiting for them, usually drunk, usually mad at something, figuring the pizza would ease their pain. Always hungry. I would deliver "superlarges with the works" to lonely skinny guys sitting in immaculate apartments, with single place settings and glasses of red-wine already poured. I would deliver to ruined families, with kids pounding the table, kids with jelly smeared on their faces, and fat old husband/fathers dreaming away in front of the tube, and I had to charge them all absurd Hollow Man prices for these silly creations that really didn't satisfy anyone, they just left a big heavy mass in your gut, and then I smiled when I got a tip and said "Thank you very much."

But it beat making them, that's for sure. I was on the move, cruising around the city, trying to break the Land Speed Record on my trike. That first night I fell in love four times, not counting that first girl with the long blond hair.

The worst case was with a 17 year old girl who answered the door in a tight yellow shirt with roses. Her breasts were ideal, and her eyes were dark grey. Have you ever fallen in love right away? I invited myself in, and we talked for awhile. She was a member of some club that was going to South America for the Christmas break. I told her I had a house in Buenos Aires, and that she and her friends could stay there. Her parents walked in as I was offering her this. They didn't like me much, so I took their money and went back to the trike. Her name was Wendy though, and I know where she lives, in case I read in the papers that her parents have been hit by a bank vault falling from the sky.

He was running. The harsh discipline of a respected leader had taken effect and a feeling of urgency existed, demanding that he not be late. As he stumbled over rocks and hurtled fallen logs, his mind rambled over the reasons why the meeting might have been called. Perhaps there was work to be done on the fort. He doubted that there was any need for supplies after the stuff they had stocked last week, but they were always looking for ways to strengthen their stronghold. Also, the plans involving offensive movement for the summer hadn't been discussed yet, perhaps his leader had decided now was the time for action. These and other thoughts crossed his mind as he made his way through the forest on that early summer morning. He ran on.

The Deep Woods was a place of conflict. For as long as anyone can remember, people from the various surrounding villages had been at arms as to where boundries began and ended. For those involved, control of the Deep Woods meant control of the most important land in the area. Freedom to travel at leisure, unlimited wood supplies, grounds for fort construction, and the inevitable and forceful pride found in possession and control, all contributed to the importance of the Woods. As a result of this importance, the actions of the various villages had formed a history of boundary disputes, treaties, and alliances, rarely allowing a year to pass without some major change. Often, during more relaxed times, the people liked to sit and trade tales of events they could remember. But usually the present situation of the Woods was the major concern. As the Deep Woods now stood, two forces had emerged as major powers, both a conglomeration of smaller groups joining with stronger forces for protection. Recently, Mud Creek had served as a natural boundary, separating the Northern and Southern forces. But a boundary in this position made the Inner Clearing, the bridge in the East, and the trails running parallel to the creek into a no-mans-land. With neither force having complete control, both avoided these areas unless they were traveling with a large force, and thus valuable parts of the Woods were unusable. No one was happy with this, but no one was willing to give in. Thus a fierce conflict had developed and recent times had been tense. With all the importance, force, and power involved, something had to give.

The trip to the fort was taking longer than usual because he had to stay clear of Mud Creek and its immediate surroundings. Rob lived in a village west of the Woods, and with the fort being in the Southeast, his journey was longer than most others. But the longer distance meant nothing to Rob as far as being a member of the Southmen was concerned. When he moved into the area over two years ago, the immediate friendship and security that Edmund, his leader, had given him had left a great impression in Rob's mind. Ed's efforts had gotten him a very loyal friend and ally.

The possible reasons for the meeting still lingered in his mind. Maybe something had happened. Perhaps Ed had decided how they were going to gain control of the clearing and the bridge. One thing was for sure, he would be finding out soon enough. Now east of the Inner Clearing, it would be under ten minutes until he'd come to the lookouts outside the fort. Quickly he passed the towering oak tree which marked the secret path to the caves, and ran through the Twin Maples. Suddenly, he was jumped from the tree above and a hand was clasped over his mouth. As he and his attacker tumbled on the ground, some words were spoken into his ear.

"Be quiet and don't worry, it's Andrew. We've had big troubles. No questions now, just follow me. Quietly."

Rob did what he was told. Andrew led him directly south, using a trail known only to himself, Rob, and a few others, Edmund included of course.

"This isn't the way to the fort," Rob whispered.

"Be quiet!" scolded Andrew.

Rob obeyed. They moved with skill through the underbrush, avoiding prickers and slipping through the growth in silence. Coming to Stone Creek, they crossed by balancing on a fallen tree, soon after arriving at a little known and rarely used clearing, almost directly west of their fort.

"Welcome Andrew, welcome Rob, we've been expecting you."

It was Edmund. Also there were Hamish and several others, all of whom Rob recognized. But what was up? Why had they been forced to meet here instead of their fort? His questions were soon answered.

"The Citadel has been taken," said Ed. Typical Ed, always quick and to the point. His stunned comrades weren't so quick with a response.

"The fort's what?" stammered Rob.

"Taken. Overrun by the Northmen. We had to have Andrew cut you off near the Twin Maples or you would have been a sitting duck. I'm sorry, but there was no way to get in touch with you this morning after I heard the news."

"When was it taken?" questioned Rob.

"Sometime last night," said Ed.

"Last night? But that's..."

"Right! It's in violation of the Night Restriction Treaty," interrupted Ed, "but the Citadel is in the hands of the enemy, and without it, we're powerless. At least for now we are."

There was silence all around.

"I must say, we should have been expecting something like this."

It was Ed talking. Those present were seated in a circle with Ed standing at one end. Needless to say, all eyes were focused on him. The meeting had been called to decide what actions should be taken. Time was of great importance, for once the North was allowed to set up a stronghold the Citadel would be lost for good.

The Northmen had broken the Night Restriction Treaty. The treaty, better known as NRT, had been a universal agreement that there would be no offensive action taken after sundown. The need for a pact of this nature had developed because of the restrictions most of the surrounding villages had placed on the men involved. For as long as those living could remember, the NRT had been accepted and followed without incident. To violate the NRT would mean the destruction of one of the strongest and most traditional laws of the land. That it had been violated was a good portrayal of how high the conflict between the North and the South had risen, and how great the drive was to have sole control of the Deep Woods.

Ed spent about ten minutes briefing the counsel on what he knew. In the day, the Citadel was well protected and just about invincible. This was usually the case with most forts in the area for they served as both the nucleus and the backbone for the entire force. It was for this reason that direct assaults on the forts were usually few and far between. Most offense was directed towards gaining control of the rivers and paths.

In the night, however, the forts were completely deserted as the NRT stopped all offensive action, temporarily removing the need for a defense. The Northmen saw this as an answer to the stalemate. By moving at night, they violated a powerful law. But with such a high chance of capturing the Citadel and thus gaining almost complete control of the Woods, they had no reason to fear any law. They would be the law.

"At this point," continued Ed, "I think a direct attack on the fort is out of the question. We all know how well it is protected by day. Besides, we want to avoid a battle that may be damaging to the fort. We can't afford a setback like that."

"I can see your point, Ed," said Andrew, "but remember that at this point the North's forces are spread thin. I say we have an all out attack. We may damage the fort, but a victory now would greatly weaken their army. Regardless of what we decide, we can't allow the North to strengthen their stronghold."

"Then we move quickly," said Hamish. "What do you have in mind, Ed?"

"We play their game," said Ed. "We'll move tonight. The laws are gone. New ones shall be written in time, but for now all is fair play. If all goes well, when the new laws are written, it will be through our doings. We must not fail.

"Tonight shall be a long night. We will need everyone. They must somehow clear themselves from their villages. That is up to the individual. Now listen carefully. At twelve midnight, I want Hamish, Andrew, and my men to meet at this clearing. It must be done quietly, attracting no attention. Arrive at staggered times, and remain quiet and still until I arrive. I will be there shortly after midnight. Be prepared for action. At the same time, I want you, Rob, to take your group to the caves southwest of the Inner Clearing. You'll need some special equipment which we'll discuss later. The same need for silence applies to you. Act accordingly. If all goes well, the fort will be ours by dawn. If not, the signal will be given and we'll all disperse until a meeting in three days time. Let's pray that the meeting need not be necessary."

The counsel sat in silence. It was a moment for heavy feelings, this perhaps being the last meeting the Southmen would have in their present state. Regardless of the night's outcome, things would change. There was little chance for success without loss. As always, the eyes turned towards Edmund, the leader, standing tall and commanding respect. But if Ed had feelings, they were well hidden deep inside his constantly plotting mind.

"Now be gone and find your men," he commanded, "there's work to be done!"

The counsel got up to leave. Ed took one last look around and hesitated momentarily, almost speaking. But whatever it was that was on his mind remained there, and he turned and slipped off into the waiting forest.

Night had fallen on the Deep Woods. The bats scuttled about the treetops and the owls were intent in their search for prey. Occasionally, the moon danced out from behind the shifting clouds giving the Woods an eerie illumination, a temporary relief from the dominating darkness. Nothing, save the occasional screech of a preditor or the music of the flowing streams, broke the silence. The forest was at peace. Almost...

The unnatural snapping of a twig and the rustling of leaves broke the silence as misguided footsteps carried the impatient warriors to their destination. It was just before midnight and the men of the South were beginning to gather in the clearing west of the Citadel. Slowly the number grew, and with it the tension as the hour of action approached. They were hunched down low, waiting for their leader. Their faces were blackened with charcoal and they were dressed in dark clothing. Their hands were clenched tightly around their weapons, their faces grave and solemn. Andrew and Hamish, the two leaders present, although being very experienced in Deep Woods warfare, felt unusually nervous. A lot rested on tonight's efforts and it was taking effect. They waited in silence.

Rob and his men had been quietly advancing towards the caves when they heard rapid, careless footsteps approaching from the other direction.

"Quick!" whispered Rob, "into the brush."

His men scattered and in an instant were hidden and silent. The footsteps stopped. Rob's heart pounded as he breathed through his shirt to avoid any noise. He was afraid to move. A soft, clear whistle broke the tense silence. Rob breathed a sigh of relief and responded, whistling a lower note in reply. Soon after, Ed appeared on the trail.

"Damn Edmund, you sure..."

"Quiet," Ed interrupted, "there's men from the North about. They're not taking any chances. We'll have to take the long way around. Are you all here?"

"Yes, 'cept for Jesse. He couldn't break loose from his village. But everyone else showed, and they're ready."

"Okay, you know what to do. Only go west until you cross the Logging Road, and then head north. I'll move operations back fifteen minutes to account for your longer route. You must avoid discovery at all cost. Everything clear?"

"Everything's clear, Ed."

"Okay, then do your stuff. I won't see you again until this is all over. I hope all goes well."

"So do I," said Rob, but Ed had already vanished into the darkness.

"Damn, where on earth is Ed," whispered a voice.

"Quiet!" snapped Hamish angrily.

"Something's gone wrong. I'm sure of it. He should have been here twenty minutes ago."

"Relax, Ed won't let us down. Don't worry about it."

But Hamish was worried. They all were. For twenty-five minutes they had waited in motionless silence. The tension had made the wait a lifetime. It wasn't like Ed to be late, especially on such a crucial occasion. With the darkness and the silence, their imaginations were going wild.

"But Hamish, we can't just sit here forever. The Northmen may have gotten Ed. Maybe they forced him to talk and they are coming here. Then we'd be..."

"Enough!" said Hamish, and he turned to Andrew. "What do you think? I must admit, I am a bit worried."

"Well Hamish, I..."

But Andrew never had a chance to finish his sentence. An explosion from the North stunned the peaceful silence, and a huge, orange flash momentarily filled the sky. The men were awestruck as the explosion was followed by gunfire and numerous smaller explosions. The sky was repeatedly lit up by bright, colorful flashes.

"Rob," screamed Andrew, "the Northmen have found Rob and they're fighting it out."

"They'll never make it," cried Hamish, "we must go and help."

Just then, a dark figure came crashing through the underbrush and collapsed on the ground.

"It's Ed," a few exclaimed.

"Ed, what's happened?" asked Hamish

"Relax. As long as we can make good time we're okay," said Ed, gasping to regain his breath. "Get your men ready, it's time to go." The men prepared to move out. "We must hurry," continued Ed, "some Northmen scouts saw me and gave me a good chase. I lost them by heading northwest, but they may think that something's up."

"But what of the guns in the North?" questioned Andrew.

"It's Rob and his men all right," said Ed, "but don't worry, it's the only way. Hopefully no one will get hurt. You must trust me. Now we go."

The force moved out. Heading north, they bushwhacked through the forest, avoiding all trails. Coming to Stone Creek, they were forced to walk in the water, soaking themselves up to their thighs. Gaining the bank on the north side, the trek continued until they were a hundred yards short of the trail running southeast to the Citadel. There Ed stopped and turned to speak.

"This is where we divide. Half of my force goes with Hamish's men, half with Andrew and his men. Hamish, take your men to a spot east of the fort and wait for my signal. Andrew, take your men north across the trail and then circle around to the east side of the fort. When I fire the signal, attack with all the noise you can. We've got to have the Northmen thinking a large force is upon them. Refrain from bloodshed unless it's necessary."

"Okay Ed, I think we're ready," said Andrew.

"All right then, let's move!" commanded Edmund. Andrew and Hamish led their men, Andrew up north to the trail and then east, Hamish to the Southeast. Andrew's scouts had discovered two of the Northmen patrolling the trail they were about to cross. This caused but a moment's pause, after which Andrew and his men moved on, the two prisoners tightly bound to a tree. Soon both parties were in position, tensely awaiting the signal from their leader, even conscious of the explosions and gunfire that continued to shatter the silence in the North.

For the second night running, the force of Northmen encamped inside the Citadel were going without sleep. It had become increasingly difficult to keep strong, alert lookouts posted. Slowly, exhaustion was dousing their fear of a night attack, and the men were slacking in their efforts to keep watch. They longed for the morning, for daylight and new, fresh replacements. A battle was the last thing they wanted.

When the first of the explosions from the North shattered the air, the men were overwhelmed in astonishment. The next few moments were mass confusion as they feared the worst. An attack on their fort in the North was what they had least expected, and thus were least prepared for.

As the explosions continued, their fears grew. Should they stay or go and help? The Citadel was of great value to them, but not more so than their own fort. Last night's conquest would be meaningless if their fort in the North was captured. And if the Southmen won in the North, what was to stop them from coming south?

The battle raged on in the North. The Northmen leaders in the Citadel were unsure, and it was taking effect on their men

(CPS) -- What is likely to be the definitive work on the frisbee has been compiled by a Grove, CA practicing psychiatrist.

In a 221-page treatise, Dr. Stancil Johnson explores the history of the saucer, as well as frisbee aerodynamics, turbulance in flight and medical problems for frisbee players.

Johnson's interest in the frisbee goes beyond the book, however. He has written Forest Lawn Memorial Parks and Mortuaries requesting that upon death, his body be cremated and mixed with the finest grade raw industrial polyethylene to make 25 high-quality, professional model frisbees.

Forst Lawn, however, has only agreed to the cremation.

In the summertime the tree just is
It stands there stretched and green while
We stroll by with guessing what it means.

It means just what it is without
A shout or shaking Bows snapped Breaking Heartwood.
No,
It's not at all like that.

It loiters where it loitered there
For years without a new despair to Tarnish it to tears.

... 'Looking Back'

They doubled their defense, being uncertain of the terrain around the fort. It was unbearable to sit and wait while their fort in the North was under seige. Fear was changing to panic and the men wanted out. The thought of the Southmen, victorious and heading south, was the climax to their fears. The Southmen's momentum would be overwhelming.

Finally the Northmen leaders decided a move was necessary. The battle up north hadn't let up in the least and they feared the worst. The men hurriedly prepared to leave, also readying themselves for the battle ahead. No one would be left behind for it would be futile to try and hold the fort without a strong force. Scouts were sent out to check the surrounding area and the men ransacked the Citadel for any useful supplies they could find. Soon they were ready and the returning scouts reported no signs of the enemy. Without any further hesitation, the force moved out through the open gates and into the clearing in front of the fort. No sooner were they outside the gates when a single, white flare, launched from somewhere close by, rocketed upward, brilliantly illuminating the sky above.

Andrew's and Hamish's forces had been anxiously awaiting the signal. Well hidden in the dark underbrush east and west of the fort, they had grown more and more excited as time passed. A while ago, there had been fear amongst the men. But Edmund's firm and steady commands had relayed a feeling of confidence throughout the ranks, and slowly the fear had been removed. Now the Southmen were excited. It was their turn to fight in defense of their Citadel. Now, after two days of defeat, they had a chance to restrengthen their battered pride. The flare, piercing the black sky above, was a fitting and much awaited climax to their silent wait.

Immediately Hamish and Andrew led their men out of hiding and into a fierce charge towards the Citadel. The Northmen, burdened down with the supplies taken from the Citadel, were unable to move quickly. Their leaders sounded a retreat back into the fort, but as they turned to run a brilliant explosion sounded from within the gates. Confused, they tried to scatter, but tripped and stumbled over each other in the process. If the Northmen had any thoughts of a battle, those thoughts vanished as the Southmen came storming into the clearing. Having no other choice, the Northmen surrendered.

Cries of victory sounded as Hamish and Andrew spread their men around the Northern force. They had done it! The Citadel was theirs without a shot being fired.

"But Andrew," cried Hamish, his voice full of joy, "what of the explosion from within the fort?"

"Well, it must have...," but he never finished his sentence as a forceful laughter sounded from within the open gates of the fort.

"Edmund," they exclaimed, "but how?"

"It was easy, my good men," he replied, "but that's a tale for other days. Andrew, Hamish, you've done well tonight. Let's take care of the prisoners, our night's work is almost done."

"Right, Ed," said Hamish.

"But wait," interrupted Andrew, "the fighting in the North, it has stopped. What of Rob and his men?"

"That, I'm afraid, is out of our hands. Rob and his men are on their own," Ed answered solemnly. "But we have captives, hostages if anything should go wrong. Let's hope we don't have to use them."

Then Ed and the rest of his men, as tired as they were, slowly set about disarming their captives and binding them with rope.

When the flare had shown over the Citadel in the South, Rob and his men were glad to see it too, but for a different reason. They were soaked with sweat and nearing exhaustion. "To sound like a battle without any actual fighting," that's what Edmund had ordered. So for the last hour and a half, Rob's force had been playing cat and mouse with the Northmen. With his men armed with blanks, strings of firecrackers, and other various explosives, Rob had brilliantly staged a false attack and battle around the fort in the North. They were constantly on the move as the confused Northmen gave chase. Several times the Northmen closed in on Rob and his men, only to be sent on a wild goosechase after some carefully placed decoy explosions.

Yet as wise as Rob's strategies had been, the fast pace was taking its toll and the men were tiring. They had been instructed to keep the staged battle going until the flare had shown in the Southern sky. But that was if all went well. As time passed and exhaustion set in, Rob had begun to worry. He knew his men couldn't last much longer, and sooner or later the Northmen would close in and force them into a corner. Doubt had set in.

Finally the flare had shown in the South and Rob breathed a sigh of relief. But the night's work wasn't over as they still had to get back to the Citadel. Quickly, Rob sent his men west towards the logging road. They were north of the Northmen's fort which made it impossible to go directly south. Rob hoped his men would be able to move down the logging road without too much resistance as most of the action had been in the East. As his men moved off, he took two men and the remaining explosives and headed southeast. Getting almost directly east of the Northmen's fort, the three men crept in until they were within two hundred yards of the front gates. They could faintly hear the confused orders of the Northmen leaders near the fort. With the help of his two men, Rob rigged all the explosives into two packets and prepared a long fuse for each. Lighting the fuses, the three men moved swiftly off through the Woods, first north and then west towards the logging road. When the explosives blew, the Northmen sent a massive charge to the East where the noise had come from. By that time, Rob and his two men were on the logging road and heading south. None of Rob's men met with any resistance on their trek back to the Citadel.

When Rob's force, and then Rob himself, arrived back at the Citadel, it was a climax to the joy and relief the rest of the Southmen had already been feeling. The happiness gained by recapturing the Citadel had been incomplete with the knowledge that Rob and his men were still facing danger. Rob's return drew a cheer from the men, and a warm welcome from his leader.

"You have done well," said Ed, "and all has gone according to plan. By the way, we have an unexpected surprise for you. Come inside the fort."

Ed led Rob to where the captured Northmen sat bound and silent.

"Well, well," exclaimed Rob, "what have we here? What do you think you'll do with them Edmund?"

"I hold no grudge," replied Ed. "We held them just in case you had trouble up north. We've recaptured the fort and you've come back unscathed. I no longer have a purpose for them"

"Oh, so it's into the river with them, right Ed?" said Rob mockingly.

"Sounds good to me," replied Ed.

"Okay then," shouted Rob, "let's go you Northmen."

Slowly they stood and began to walk out of the Citadel gates, guided by the Southmen guards. Suddenly they bolted, butting over and trampling the Southmen guards.

"Let them run," shouted Ed, "but get hold of one and bring him to me."

The guards tackled one of the Northmen who had been tripped up in the escape. Quickly they brought him to his feet and dragged him over to where Ed was standing. Ed spoke with awesome force.

"You and your comrades are fortunate that we of the Citadel are good in nature. You shall return to the North unharmed. In return for your safety, you shall do us a favor. When you return to your leader in the North, tell him you have spoken with Edmund of the Citadel. Remind him of the NRT. Then take thorough measures to remind your leader of how the NRT has been an obeyed and respected law longer than anyone living today can remember. And then, when he in a violent vocal exhibition claims my thinking to be ignorance, my strategies as folly, and my power as non-existent, and then prides himself for his short, yet sweet control of the Citadel, remind him of how that control was gained. Tonight he lost but a battle and a fort. They, perhaps, in time can be regained. But tomorrow, when the sun rises, he will find a deficit greater than the loss of any battle or any fort could ever cause, for by attacking the Citadel at night, he has cast his honor to the wind. And no control of any fort, any path, any river, or the entire Deep Woods itself, can ever prove more valuable than what he has lost. His loss is our triumph, and our gain, and we shall rejoice accordingly." Edmund paused for a moment to think and regain his breath. "Now be gone, and relay my message. I don't want to see you again."

Ed turned and went back inside the fort, and the prisoner headed for the woods. Then Andrew shouted.

"Wait!" The prisoner stopped. "One half mile north there is an old dead tree lying across the trail. Do you know of it?"

"Yes sir," replied the prisoner.

"From that tree head east for fifty yards. There you will find two of your comrades bound to a tree. Set them free and take them with you."

"Yes sir," said the prisoner.

"Oh yes, and there's one more thing," said Andrew, and he slowly walked toward the prisoner. The prisoner looked nervous and moved backwards as Andrew approached. "These are for you and your two unfortunate comrades bound to the tree up north. You have a long trip ahead of you and we thought this stuff might help you along." Andrew handed the prisoner a brown bag. "Now be off, my friend," commanded Andrew, "and do the task we've asked you to perform." The prisoner turned and ran, tightly grasping a bag filled with apples, bread, and some bars of chocolate, and soon had disappeared into the dark, silent forest.

A single candle burned in a room inside the Citadel. The candle was stuck into an old bottle, and the bottle stood in the center of an old, round, wooden table. Around the table sat Rob, Andrew, Hamish and Edmund. Although exhausted from the night's activities, Ed had insisted upon the meeting. Rob, Andrew, and Hamish had welcomed the suggestion, enthusiastic for the chance to relax and talk with their leader. But Ed's face had been grave, and now the three worried as to what could be wrong. Ed's voice was solemn as he addressed his men.

"I want to thank you guys for tonight's work. It was important that we find victory tonight, especially for me. We have experienced a lot together and I wanted to go out on a good note."

"Go out?" interrupted Rob, "what do you mean?"

"First, I want you all to understand that it's nothing I can control. The last thing I'd want is to leave you, and the Deep Woods. My life has been here, as long as I can remember. I know nothing else. But my village is moving, and I must go with them. Perhaps someday there will be a time when I need not follow my village, a time when I can live without them. But that time has not come yet. And so, my friends, I must leave you."

The other three were stunned. What could they say? They desperately searched for the words that might express their feelings. They felt empty and alone. Their leader was leaving them. Who would take over and lead the Southmen as Ed had led them? Who would give direction and serve as the unifying light for the men? Suddenly they felt small and weak sitting next to the one they had followed for so long. Ed seemed to sense this, and as the leader he spoke to reassure his friends.

"But let it be a departure of happiness," he said. "We are rich in the memories we share, and no one can take them from us. You will remain in the Citadel to continue the tradition the Southmen of the Citadel have established. My time here has ended, my chapter written. In time, you too may find it necessary to leave the Deep Woods. So be it. Through it all, the Deep Woods shall remain, its story continuing for those here to be part of. We are nothing but small fragments of the endless Deep Woods story, as the Deep Woods is but a fragment of the story of our lives. That is not important. What is important is that for some reason, for a certain period of time, your fragments and mine have overlapped, and we have been able to share some of our time in the Deep Woods together. And though I leave you, you will always remain a part of me. I don't have anything else to say. Please try to understand." The three tried. After a pause, Edmund stood and motioned to his friends.

"Come, my friends, it has been a long night. Time has grown short and dawn is almost upon us." The three rose, silent and speechless. "Let us walk the trails of the forest together, and watch the Deep Woods awaken with the coming of the warmth and light of the morning sun."

And that's exactly what they did.

The End (sort of)

The Final End To 'Looking Back'

An Explanation

A cold shiver shook his body. His eyes were still closed, but he could hear the music of the babbling brook nearby. He ached from sitting too long in one position. Slowly he opened his eyes and stretched his arms. The sun had gone down and the night was quickly approaching. He wondered how long he had slept.

He had wanted to come here, to this clearing in the forest, to the tree upon which he leaned. He was going to school now, far away from here, far from where he had lived for twelve years of his life. His reasons for leaving his home and his forest were hard to understand, but it was something he felt he had to do. Although he had gone far away, his leaving had only been physical. He had memories. His childhood was full of forts come and gone, of friends, real friends that one shared secret paths and clearings with, and of adventures that only children could really understand. Those old times, now seeming so distant in the present's full hours, carried a strong appeal to him.

So he returned to the forest and the land which had given him so much as a child. His yearnings had led him to the clearing by the brook, and the tree that one could climb to view the entire forest from end to end. It was there that he sat to rest, and had been sung to sleep by the trickling stream nearby. It was there that he had his dream.

But now it was time to go. The day was ending, and so was the summer. He was excited about the coming of fall and school. He rose, brushing himself off, and headed down the trail back to his house. Through his dream he had relived an adventure from his past, a remembrance of how, as a child, his imagination had given him adventures the likes of which had not been experienced since. As he returned to his house, the dream still in vivid detail in his mind, he half-heartedly thought of trying to write a story which would express the feeling of adventure he had experienced as a child. To depict the loyalty between friends, the sadness when a friend had to leave, the excitement a wooded area and an imagination could bring to a child, and the forceful honor they as children had when they left their houses, or so-called villages, and headed out to the woods to live the adventures their imaginations had brought to them; this is what he was thinking of writing of.

With time the idea grew, and out of it came these pages. Whether his readers will experience the feeling of adventure that he did is yet to be seen.

Enduring The Twilight -Cynic Short Story Winner

by Dave Gacetta

I swore when employed in a nursing home as a kid that I would be a model patient when I got old. To work as hard as I could at walking, eating, talking about the good old days; These would keep me busy, and use up my energy. I would be content to help those aides and orderlies, and they would appreciate it. I wouldn't try and get away with things like some of those patients I knew. Wanting their faces washed for them, someone to feed them, carry them to and from the chair and the bed, rub their back every five minutes---not me, no-oo sir. They wouldn't have to baby me. I would keep my respect, and they would call me Mister Clark, Mister Thomas Clark. I'd hold my bowels until I was on the toilet, and control my bladder if able.

Well, years sped by faster and faster, each successive year much shorter than the previous, and my time as a self-supportive senior citizen drew to a rapid close.

My first stroke came when I was 67, two weeks after my daughter Sarah's 40th birthday. I was visiting her family at the time, and she got pretty shook-up when I slumped to the floor, I later heard. Charles, her husband, had received first-aid training as a volunteer fireman, and he kept me prone, warm, and alive until the Rescue Squad arrived to sweep me off with a rush and a bweep-bweep-bweep to the local hospital. He also kept his wife and children as calm as possible during this drama, which they tell me wasn't very calm.

The hospital kept me much longer than I thought necessary, Sarah visiting me every day with her drawn out, near-death, full-of-sadness faces gradually straightening out to something more normal.

My doctor, beaming in confidence, suggested that I would be released the following week, but thought that perhaps I would think about living with my daughter for a while, anyway, until I was fully recovered. She had been trying to get me to live in the apartment section of their house since her mother died some three years earlier, and now the good doctor was on her side. I told him that I would go anywhere, as long as he would let me out of that boring hospital.

Two days later, I suffered my second stroke, this one much worse than the first, leaving a residual sagging of my left side, and greatly reducing my control over that leg, arm, and other muscles.

Weeks later, I heard the doctor talking to Sarah, saying that perhaps I had recovered as much as could be expected, and they should contact a physical therapist and an occupational therapist to assist me in the use of my parasitic left side, which sounded to me like a miracle of the order of Lazarus, but I was willing to try if they were.

The work that followed was indescribable. Never had I tried so hard, so very hard and for such meager results. I managed to wiggle the two fingers nearest my thumb, but could not open my hand. I could strain the muscles in my left arm for as long as he stood there watching, but failed to lift it more than an inch. The brace on my left leg was tight, but served its purpose well, and I could stand okay with help. I gradually gained a little control over my arm, but not enough to call it mine to use.

I've been sick off and on since then, plagued by hardened arteries, kidney infection, intestinal disorders, pneumonia, many varieties of skin rashes, and, well, lots of things I hadn't bargained on when I was a kid. But anyway, here I am at a nursing home, and a nice one at that. My daughter and family decided that they couldn't take care of me, and if I could have talked, I would have told them not to try, that I belonged in a nursing home now. I had noticed her kids looking at me kind of sideways trying to figure me out, and I also noticed how nervous and unhappy she was inside when she took the family to visit me, despite the shiny front she tried to present.

Anyhow, I ended up at this Old Folks Home---excuse me, they don't call them that any more. This one is either the extended care facility or the convalescent center. I can't remember. She came to eat lunch with me almost daily. I remembered my vow as a kid to keep my respect, and grab for all of the life I could get, but somehow I hadn't thought that it would be this hard. Sure, I could feed myself, not very fast, and not very steadily, but I could get most of it into my mouth. Chewing was pretty tough, and I got mostly just food that looked like colored oatmeal, or that mushy-greenish part of the pea soup we used to get at my parochial grade school. It tasted fine though, if it was spiced just right, but sometimes the aides would be in such a hurry that they would forget to open those paper salt and pepper containers, and sometimes they would open them and just pour the spices onto my pureed meat, and it would just sit there all in a lump, undissolved, and not helping out much. Sarah would remind them that perhaps they could take time to prepare her father's tray correctly, so that he could enjoy that slop that they served him, but sometimes she got too cross with them, and I heard them after she left, saying that they wish she would stay at home and let them take care of me. I wish that I could tell them what I wished.

Even with the brace I couldn't walk, but if my legs were arranged properly, I could stand up with somebody's help, or else help somebody to stand me up. I tried, and really helped as much as I could, but some of them got impatient with me, and tried to pick me up and toss me into that uncomfortable geriatric chair, even without thinking about my legs and feet. No wonder I was so heavy to them; they had to support all of me themselves. None of the weight was on my own legs, except that little that went through my ankles and toes or whatever else happened to be on the floor at the time. I yelled, to tell them how much my feet hurt from putting all of that weight on my toes, or to tell them that my arms hurt when they were tugged on like that. My yelling caused them to sigh in disgust, telling me to be quiet Tommy, because they weren't hurting me, they were helping me, and I could try to help them, and there was no reason to yell, now, was there. I couldn't argue with their bright young logic, mostly because I could not make many sounds from my mouth.

I worked at it. I guess a listener could tell if I was happy or unhappy by the tone of the yell, and I could manage a kind of "yes" and a kind of "no".

I could manage my bowels pretty well, but only for just so long, particularly when the nurse poured laxatives into me. I lost control of my bladder, and had a narrow rubber tube called a catheter inserted through my urinary tract to my bladder, where a small balloon on the end of it was inflated to keep it from falling out. It wasn't too bad when I was in bed, because they usually pinned the slack to the bedsheet, but sometimes sitting in that chair, the tubing would be pulling on me for hours. And with that in, I didn't often get placed on the toilet. They would be disgusted with me if I messed in the bed, or on the chair, but I honestly tried to wait until I was on the toilet, or even on a bedpan, but there was no way to tell them. If I yelled, they would tell me to be quiet, would offer me juice, or perhaps the nurse would give me some medicine to calm me down. Sometimes, they would close my door so they couldn't hear me.

Well I had lots of time to think about life, and fate, and death and the aging process, and I decided that the respect I longed for was only a pipedream. I was called "Tom", or "Tommy", or even "Clarkie" by the workers. They always put a bib on me at mealtime, sometimes flowered, sometimes polka-dots, but generally it was the same one all day, whether I had spilled cream of wheat on it at breakfast or not. Sometimes I would get the same one two days in a row, and my daughter would change it for me. She still came in almost every day, but she treated me with less respect than the aides had at times. She insisted on calling me "Pa" in a tone usually reserved for naughty children who had just embarrassed their parents in public. She treated me like her kid, yelling at me, threatening me, even shaking me occasionally in her frustration, as I failed her so miserably. Why did I do that to her? Why am I such a dummy? Why don't I try and do things for myself?

I had perfect answers prepared for these. They were crisp, precise, and sure to gain back respect. But the words wouldn't come out. Only a mess of monotone, and she would yell at me to stop mumbling. But I hung on to life for its very significance, sure that there was something sacred to it that was not to be sacrificed by me.

I withstood insult after insult, and spent hours locked into a geriatric chair, my legs dangling over the edge, but never touching the floor. A chest belt was used to make sure that I wouldn't fall out of bed, or out of the toilet seat, and was beginning to feel rather confined.

Then, after a very hot summer, came this surprisingly cold autumn. I shivered through most of it, being covered with sweaters and blankets, they even tried to put shirts on me backwards, all to no avail, for I fell victim to pneumonia again this winter. Breathing was my main concentration, and coughing spells would last for what seemed to be at least eternity, before the fluid would settle somewhere and allow me to breathe again, with a little less difficulty. I couldn't move much, was kept straight in bed, my head raised, and receiving vital sugar intravenously. I could hear people peeking in cautiously, whispering about how sick I looked, and wondering if I could pull through it. From their whispers, I found out that I had been laid out like this for 6 weeks when I decided to remember these events in order, perhaps to later write them down.

Today my daughter and family came in, and for a while they stared in silence. They whispered, figuring I couldn't hear them, but that is one sense that remained remarkably keen. He told her that I didn't look very well today, and she replied that this seemed to be the worst shape she's ever seen me in. Then she told him something that I had never heard from her before, had never considered seriously before. She told him that it is strange how some people who have no will to live can't die, but seem to hang on in perpetual limbo, while others die in their prime, or even before their prime. Look at Jimmy Stone down the street, he told her. He was ten years old, died in a car accident. And here's your father, all skin and bones, as good as dead but for the suffering. But still he's alive. Too bad he just doesn't die and end all of the suffering, she said to him, for him and us.

I started to cry inside. I'm not sure if there were tears, but I was crying all the same, and they must have noticed something, because they moved near, and she took my good hand in hers. I had been trying to live, I hadn't given up on life. I hadn't wanted to die. But suddenly something snapped inside of me. So life wasn't really sacred. I was wrong. It shouldn't be striven for always.

Unrequited memories and hopes from my optimistic adolescence flashed by as I felt my soul leave my body.

QUESTION: What is the opinion of medical professionals on Adele Davis's book, Let's Eat Right to Keep Fit?

ANSWER: Neither I nor my dietitian consultants recommend this book. Although it is indeed filled with interesting vignettes, it contains statements which, in the opinion of virtually all well-qualified people in the area of nutrition, are inaccurate and misleading. For example, in discussing the use of calcium supplements, the author suggests that taking calcium before visiting a dentist will allow an individual to be relaxed and feel less pain... that taking calcium will relieve "arthritis" within one to three days... or will relieve the itching associated with hives in about an hour. It further suggests that taking calcium will allow an individual to have a virtually painless obstetrical delivery. It further recommends keeping calcium in the medicine chest as a "pain killer par excellence." The book is filled with many other similar inaccurate and misleading statements.

QUESTION: Does eating foods low in cholesterol (a low cholesterol diet) decrease a person's chances of developing atherosclerosis or heart disease?

ANSWER: This question is not as simple to answer as many individuals would believe. A fairly common belief can be summed up as suggesting that "if one eats a diet which is too high in cholesterol, he will develop fatty-like deposits on the lining of certain arteries (atherosclerosis), thereby developing high blood pressure and coronary artery disease." The rationale then proceeds to suggest that, this being the case, "if one's diet consists of food low in cholesterol, his blood cholesterol level will remain normal and, therefore, he will not develop these problems."

Such thinking would appear to be an extreme oversimplification. There is no question that an elevated blood cholesterol is one of several so-called "high-risk factors" for the development of certain kinds of vascular disease. There is also scientific evidence accumulating which suggests that if such an individual has several of these "high-risk factors," including an elevated serum cholesterol, and if his serum cholesterol is lowered, there is less likelihood of his developing certain kinds of vascular disease. However, it has been virtually impossible, to this point at least, to separate the effect of high serum cholesterol levels from other high-risk factors such as obesity, cigarette smoking or physical inactivity. Also, there is no question that one must take into consideration the genetic aspects of control of serum lipids (fats), including cholesterol. There is, for example, one school of thought which suggests that high serum cholesterol levels may, in fact, be a metabolic disorder which runs in families. (There is a specific abnormality which does run in families called "Hypercholesterolemia" and is characterized by extremely high serum cholesterol levels.) The problem is further complicated by the recognition that not only may dietary cholesterol influence the level of cholesterol in the blood, but that the body can -- and, in fact, does -- manufacture its own cholesterol.

With that confusing situation then, a reasonable recommendation, I think, would be as follows: For an ordinarily healthy individual eating an ordinary, well-balanced diet, I do not feel it is necessary to be concerned to any great extent about totally eliminating high cholesterol foods from one's diet. If, however, an individual has several of the high-risk factors for cardiovascular disease, he very likely should give serious attention to decreasing his dietary intake of cholesterol. It is equally as important, if not more so, to give attention to problems of overweight, physical inactivity and cigarette smoking. In the final analysis, perhaps the best response to this concern is for an individual to consult his physician before radically altering his diet in any way, so that he may have assistance in decreasing all his "risk factors" to the greatest extent possible.

Thoughts On Easy Credit

Easy credit has become one of the most serious of all consumer problems and can often lead to tragic consequences for the consumer. Every person has to make some critical decisions in the purchasing of items sooner or later. Usually one of the first major items of concern is in the purchasing and financing of a car. People often just look at the initial price of a car without other charges involved which usually total an extra 400 to 600 dollars on new cars. Then comes the problem of financing, but usually this can be no problem at all because car dealers and especially finance companies, if you borrow money from them, will be willing to lend you money. Why? because of the steep interest rates they charge in addition to the finance charges, late penalty fees, and installment fees. If you're buying by the month, be on the guard for some of the enormous interest rates. An interest rate of 1½% per month doesn't sound like a lot, but once you multiply that by 12 it comes to 18% a year, and that is a lot. Finance companies throw their easy, convenient payment loans of credit at you, but with all the loop holes attached they are in actuality robbing the consumer of their hard earned money. With late payment fees comes additional charges and interest rates that further burdens the consumer.

This doesn't just happen with buying a car, but with everyday purchase of goods, and especially from the door to door salesman. Think, before you make a purchase. Figure out the actual amount that will be spent as opposed to what it appears you will be spending. Easy credit terms are readily available, but what you actually pay may cost you an arm and a leg.

Stowe Carnival

The largest purse ever offered in the sport of skiing, some $80,000 in prize money alone, will be presented this January as the feature event of the 1976 Stowe Winter Carnival.

Gar Anderson, president of the Stowe Winter Carnival, announced today that the $80,000 in prize money Colgate, Equitable, Ski America, the Mt. Mansfield Company, and the Stowe Winter Carnival have jointly made available over $75,000 in organizational and promotional costs for this Professional Freestyle Association event.

"Colgate Women's Freestyle Skiing Championships" and the "Equitable – Ski America Classic" will take place on Mt. Mansfield and Spruce Peak January 23-25, 1976. The Colgate Palmolive Company has provided $50,000. for the women's purse at Stowe this year and the Equitable Life Assurance Society of America has offered $30,000. for the men's. In addition to the ABC's "Wide World of Sports" will be on hand again this year to film the "Equitable – Ski America Classic" for broadcast nationwide sometime in March. In addition, Colgate has chosen to return to Stowe to film a half-hour special on women's freestyle skiing which is expected to be shown as a prime time feature on ABC the first week in March.

Women's Basketball Opens

UVM's women's basketball team opened their season Friday, December 5th with a hearty win of 72-25 against Vermont College. Coach Jean Condon started Sally Brammer, Sue Murdock, Gail McWilliam, Chris Comeau and Mary Eddy, but the entire team contributed strongly to the victory.

Mary Eddy was high scorer with 14 points for UVM, and proved her ability both offensively and on defense. Sally Brammer was close behind with 10 points to her credit, and should be complimented for the enthusiasm and hustle she displayed in the game. Eileen Giguere came on strong in the second half, capturing many of the turnovers for UVM.

UVM clearly dominated the entire game, but more so in the first half putting 43 points on the board to Vermont College's 11 points and captured 19 turnovers and 28 rebounds. Vermont College began to put some points on the board at the beginning of the second half, but UVM had the overwhelming advantage of 29 points to VC's 14 and the game ended a UVM victory of 72-25.

Belinda Emerson, a young member of the UVM squad, proved to be the first injury of the season when she was hurt with three minutes to go in the first half. She has a possible sprained ankle, but should be back playing soon.

This team is off to a good start and should prove to be an exciting team to watch throughout the season. The next game is Wednesday, December 10 at Patrick Gymnasium starting at 6 p.m.

Power Volleyball

Power volleyball has hit UVM. The UVM volleyball team is psyched and ready to meet Linden State College for their first intercollegiate game. This eight-member squad, organized by player-coach Ted Grant, hopes to represent UVM against Middlebury College, Johnson State College, Keene, Norwich, and possibly U of Massachusetts in the upcoming semester.

Power volleyball, new to Vermont, is as exciting to watch as it is to play. The dig, set, spike style of offense, as UVM has adopted, will provide non-stop action for the fan and reason to sweat for the opposition. Olympic class spikes have been clocked at upwards of 80 mph.

With the expert coaching of women's coach Cathy Schiller and player-coach Ted Grant, this year's team promises to be exciting. The team is open to new players of any ability. Practices are Monday – Thursday 6–8 in the Patrick Gym. Questions? Call Ted Grant x3491 or Steve Betzler x3302.

Review Of The '75 Ski Season

by Chris Brown

The first two ski carnivals were won by the host schools. The final two, Williams and Middlebury went to Middlebury and Dartmouth. At the National Championships UVM came through with a second. That was the highest finish ever in a national championship for any Vermont team and the highest finish in the national skiing championships for an eastern school in over ten years.

The UVM carnival was the first chance for the Eastern ski powers to test each other. Therefore, it was watched by everyone as an indicator of what was to come. Thursday January 30 was the day of the cross country, the first event of the four event meet. With eleven schools competing it was expected that the powerful Dartmouth running team would dominate.

Chris Nice from Dartmouth finished with the fastest time followed by Craig Ward of Middlebury. UVM's Stan Dunklee and Morten Gaarud finished third and fifth to keep Vermont in contention. Dartmouth picked up sixth place giving them a one point edge so far. However, the top three finishers from each school are counted and Vermont's Trygve Kjolseth finished a strong eighth beating Dartmouth's third man by three places. Vermont then took a two point lead winning the cross country and defeating the favorite Dartmouth.

The slalom was held Friday morning at Smugglers Notch. With so many top national level racers in the field representing UVM, Dartmouth, Middlebury and UNH no one dared risk a prediction. Vermont stunned the competition. Middlebury's Peter Kenny won the event, but UVM filled the next three places to win the event by 11 points over second place UNH.

On the results of the slalom Vermont took an 18 point lead in the meet over second place Middlebury. Dartmouth fell to fourth, five points behind New Hampshire and 31 behind Vermont.

We did less well in the Giant Slalom. Coming in third behind UNH and Middlebury, we held the lead still but only by 12 points as the meet went into Saturday's jump, the fourth and final event.

Vermont's jumping team had dominated Eastern competition for the two previous years. It was doubtful that anyone could catch them. Dartmouth gave UVM a contest but were too far behind after the alpine events to be a threat for the carnival title.

Kongsli and Rolseth jumped to first and second. Dartmouth held on to third and fourth. Joe Lamb, Vermont's third jumper was sixth as compared to Dartmouth eighth. Vermont then won the event and the meet.

Joe Lamb won his first of four nordic combined medals. Duda Bruce of UVM with a third in the slalom and a fifth in the giant slalom won the Alpine combined.

Vermont had the lead in the four event and final results with 337 points. UNH was second with 304 and Dartmouth third with 301.

Dartmouth won their own carnival the next weekend. Vermont had a rough time in the slalom but finished strong in the nordic events and came in second with Middlebury third. The Williams carnival was won by Middlebury. UVM again was second and Dartmouth finished third.

The Eastern Championships coincided with the Middlebury carnival. The first three teams at Middlebury would be eligible for the National Championships in Durango, Colorado. Vermont won the cross country and the giant slalom. Then in the slalom disaster struck. Dick Erdman finished second but three others didn't finish or were disqualified and only two racers counted.

Even though we won the jump, the best we could finish overall was third, but it was good enough to go to the Nationals.

In Colorado, UVM dominated the Eastern schools easily with high places in all the events. Finishing second to Colorado rounded off a long and exciting season for the Ski Cats.

This year with plenty of strong competitors at Vermont and the Nationals in the East, we are definitely strong contenders for Vermont's first national title.

1975 All- Yan Con Soccer Team

The three contending teams for the Yankee Conference soccer title last fall, Vermont, the champions; Connecticut and Rhode Island, dominated the balloting of YanCon soccer coaches, it was announced today (Nov 26) by Conference soccer publicist Dick Whittier.

Connecticut, paced by freshman sensation Medric Innocent, who was named in all seven of the coaches ballots, landed four men on the all- star team of 11 men, while Vermont and Rhode Island each placed three men on the club. Vermont's captain Bob Cleverdon and leading point-getter in New England, John Koerner, also were named to every ballot, as was Rhody's Mario Pereira and Dan McCrudden, the Conference's leading scorer based on a points-per-game basis. Maine had one player, lineman Ted Woodbrey, named to the team.

Last week after the Vermont-New Hampshire basketball game, I talked to Coach Salzberg about the game. I also asked him a few questions about key performers and we discussed some of the Cats' game strategies.

The first thing we talked about were the aspects of play that the Cats will have to improve on if they are to beat the good teams. Coach Salzberg commented on how the team defense will have to improve. He also said our shot selection was very poor against New Hampshire. We also need better passing and more movement on offense. Coach was also displeased at our rebounding performance against New Hampshire.

Over the weekend the Cats played well in all areas as they bumped Maine 108-84. They lost the opening game at Orono 77-72 after being down by 21 midway through the second half. They showed many characteristics of becoming a fine team. They never gave up and battled back. True indications of a winner.

I asked Coach Salzberg about the play of the freshmen. He said that the play of the freshmen has been very surprising. He commented on how quickly they have adjusted to our style of play.

The rapid maturity of these young freshmen will give us much depth at all positions. The coach said that he will use ten men in all games.

Another big question that was apparently answered this past weekend was whether Charlie Trapani could perform with his same aggressiveness as he did in his freshman season. Charlie had a knee operation last year and many believed he would never be the same again. I think Charlie silenced the skeptics in the second Maine game as he poured in seven straight shots in the final half as well as hauling down many key rebounds.

Coach Salzberg was also pleased with the early season performance of Kevin Kelly. He said that Kevin has a real nice shooting touch for a big man and will be a big factor on this year's team.

I asked the coach whether we will continue to use a full court press against quicker and better ball handling teams such as Massachusetts and Boston University. He said, "we will continue to use the press until it does not work effectively." He commented on how in the first two games the press eventually frustrated the opposition into committing many turnovers, and generally disrupted their offensive patterns. Coach Salzberg emphasized that when you can get their top ballplayer to tire while trying to break the press, then the press is a success. Northeastern's and New Hampshire's top players were guards, and in the second half of each game they tired. Because of this, their scoring totals were down.

Swimmers

The University of Vermont Swim Team opened its 1975-76 dual meet season this past Saturday, December 6, against a very strong Williams team at Forbush Natatorium. Williams, which has one of the stronger swim teams in all of New England, took the first event of the meet, the 400 yard medley relay, and never relinquished the lead.

Despite the loss, the Catamounts made a good showing for themselves, and in fact had several bright spots. Junior Eric Dunn got his first experience as a distance man and came through with very respectable times in both the 500 yard and 1000 yard freestyle events. He had company from teammates Trip Blair and Mark Haun in the 500 yard freestyle. Blair was UVM's lone scorer in the 200 yard freestyle, as was Mark Haun in the 200 yard butterfly. Captain Buz Jones, who is ranked as one of the better sprint flyers in New England, and freshman Mark Kinne also performed well in the 200 butterfly. Last year's recipient of the Vermont

Swimmers Lose To Williams

Ron Kirkwood

The University of Vermont Swim Team opened its 1975-76 dual meet season this past Saturday, December 6, against a very strong Williams team at Forbush Natatorium. Williams, which has one of the stronger swim teams in all of New England, took the first event of the meet, the 400 yard medley relay, and never relinquished the lead.

Despite the loss, the Catamounts made a good showing for themselves, and in fact had several bright spots. Junior Eric Dunn got his first experience as a distance man and came through with very respectable times in both the 500 yard and 1000 yard freestyle events. He had company from teammates Trip Blair and Mark Haun in the 500 yard freestyle. Blair was UVM's lone scorer in the 200 yard freestyle, as was Mark Haun in the 200 yard butterfly. Captain Buz Jones, who is ranked as one of the better sprint flyers in New England, and freshman Mark Kinne also performed well in the 200 butterfly. Last year's recipient of the Vermont Swimmer of the Year Award, Ron Kirkwood, started off the season in excellent form winning the 50 yard, and 100 yard Freestyles, and also anchoring the 400 yard Free Relay to an exciting victory. Also on that Freestyle Relay were Mike Kurt, Pete Gelhaar and freshman standout Dava Platow. Platow and Gelhaar should each prove to be strong performers throughout the season in both the Sprint Freestyle and Backstroke events. Kurt, who last year placed sixth in New England in the 200 yard individual medley, continued to dominate that event against Williams, while receiving strong back-up points from Gary Zibro. Dave Lowry, who has been hampered by a bad cold, dived well for Vermont.

UVM's Mike Kurt

Also performing well for Vermont were Bob Hershfield, Warren Hoffman, Kevin Fisher, Allan Kopel, Jim Harrell, Pete Andrews, Craig Morton and Ed Richards.

For those of you who will be in the area towards the end of Christmas vacation and would like to see an exciting meet, UVM hosts Keene State College at home on Wednesday, January 21. The Cats will then travel to the University of Maine for a very tough Yankee Conference dual meet on the 24th of January. So have a nice break between semesters, and please feel free to drop into Forbush Natatorium at 3:00 p.m. on January 21 to see the UVM Men's Swim Team in action.

Hoopsters Split With Maine

The University of Vermont went to Orono, Maine this past weekend and split with the University of Maine Black Bears.

In the opener Maine built up a 39-23 halftime lead, and then held off a second-half Vermont surge to win 77-72.

Before a standing room only crowd, Paul Wholey and freshman Kevin Lapham combined for 47 points to lead the Black Bears.

Once again Vermont got off to a slow start, falling behind by eight points. The Cats recovered to tie it at 8-8 but 16 first half turnovers and an ice-cold 29 percent shooting were the reasons for defeat.

The Cats went into a zone press early in the fourth period, as they trailed 55-34. UVM forced Maine into numerous turnovers and outscored the Bears 29-14 over a ten minute stretch. Mark Cubit tallied eight straight points, Sam Copeland added two baskets, Kevin Kelly poured in seven and Cubit added five more during the stretch, and cut the lead to 69-63.

Things were looking up for Vermont, but a couple of turnovers and three points on a foul situation gave Maine a nine point lead.

Both Kelly and Ron Gottachalk fouled out for Vermont in the foul filled game.

Although the Cats lost, it was encouraging to see them come back in the second half. Cubit led the Cats in scoring with 22 points while Kelly poured in 13 and had eight rebounds. For Maine Kevin Lapham had 24, Paul Wholey 23, and Bob Warner 17.

VERMONT REBOUNDS FOR WIN

Coach Salzberg remarked after Friday's loss that Vermont had learned that you can lose a game early, and it proved true Saturday afternoon. The Cats learned their lesson well and came out flying and eventually captured a solid 108-84 win over Maine.

UVM jumped to a 12-2 lead before Maine fought back to tie the game at 14 with 13:51 left in the first half. The Catamounts got in early foul trouble and 15 first half free throws for Maine enabled them to take a 49-44 halftime lead.

Vermont substituted freely, and their press finally wore down the Bears. Charlie Trapani, who had 15 points, gave UVM a 58-57 lead and they gradually increased it to as much as 26 late in the game. Trapani, looking really strong for the first time, was a key in the Vermont victory as he hit on seven of seven from the field and had many rebounds. Mark Sobelewski and Ron Gottschalk joined Trapani in controlling the boards and poured in 13 and 14 points each. Warren Prehmus led all scorers with 28 points, while point guard Mark Cubit had another good game with 18 points and seven assists.

For Maine Paul Wholey was high with 27 while Bob Warner had 23 and Kevin Laphan 18.

Vermont showed its depth as six men hit double figures and all 10 men had a chance to play. Their constant press wore down the Bears and the unbelievable shots from Friday night were not there.

The Cats played very steady ball with only 13 turnovers, while Maine had 22.

The Cats are now 3-1 and 2-1 in the Yankee Conference prior to the St. Mike's game on Tuesday.

Christensen, Koerner in All-Star Game

Vermont's All-Yankee Conference performers Carl Christensen and John Koerner, both sophomores, have been selected to play in the annual New England Intercollegiate Soccer All-Star game, Dec. 7, at Springfield College beginning at 12:45 p.m. Koerner, a lineman, was the leading Division I soccer in New England with 15 goals and eight assists, the most points ever scored by a Yankee Conference player. Full-back Christensen was Vermont's big man on defense. He had a particularly great game in the 4-3 loss to Connecticut in the NCAA playoffs. Nov. 19. Paul Reinhardt, who was recently named New England's Division I Coach of the Year, was very pleased. "It's a great honor for both players. It demonstrates, I believe, the respect every one had for our team this year. Both players will return next season so I'm sure we'll be heard from again."

Well, the Division I hockey season is still in its young stages and already several upsets and surprises have occurred that have the sports writers and hockey critics buzzing. As we swing into the third big week of hockey action, there are a few things we should note about last week. Harvard, one of the big Division I powers, had a rough opening week. The Crimsons came from behind to knock off a stubborn Northeastern sextet, 5-4 and more recently on Saturday night (Dec. 6) a tough Pennsylvania team, playing their home-opener, tripped up powerful Harvard 4-3.

In other games, the Providence Friars (the Wilson Gang) edged pesky R.P.I. 5-4 in overtime. The Big Red of Cornell got slowed up last week by losing to Brown 7-2 and then beating punchless Yale by only one goal 5-4. Our UVM Cats, still searching for that illusive first win, lost a tough one to the Larries of St. Lawrence 5-3 at Potsdam, N.Y. Saturday. But, the two big surprise teams I feel thus far have been Dartmouth, owning 8-7 (OT) and 7-6 (OT) wins over Princeton and UVM, (their only loss was to pre-season favorite B.U. 5-3 at Hanover, N.H.) and Clarkson, which everyone can see in action here Friday night.

The Clarkson Golden Knights bolster a 3-1 record in Division I and 4-4 record overall. Coach Jerry York has two fine goaltenders this year in senior George Galbraith and Brian Shields, with the younger Shields beating out the veteran and doing an excellent job so far. Much of the scoring punch has come from Dave Taylor and Marco Cardoni. It should be an excellent game, so let's get out there and spark our Cats on to their first Division I win. Have a great Christmas vacation!

P.S. – If you haven't got the Catamount Hockey program for 1975-76, I suggest you do so. Dick Whittier and the public relations staff have compiled another tremendous program, congratulations! Also Wednesday night B.U. and Harvard square off at B.U.'s Walter Brown arena.

Maintaining a busy schedule this past week, women's athletics at UVM were successful in all their endeavors.

This past weekend, the volleyball "B" squad closed the volleyball season in a tri-meet at Castleton State College. In the double elimination series, UVM lost their first match to Castleton 15-4, 15-7, but bounced back in the second match to drop Siena College (N.Y.) 15–3, 15–11. In the third match Castleton again defeated UVM, however this time by a much lesser margin – 15–9, 15–10.

On Friday, December 5, the UVM Women's Basketball team celebrated their opener with a 72–25 win over Vermont College. By the completion of the first half UVM held the lead 43–11. Vermont College upped their defense in the second half, allowing UVM only 29 points to their 14. High scorers for the UVM effort were Mary Eddy with 14 and Sally Brammer with 10 points.

Thursday found the women gymnasts of UVM competing against Plymouth State College. UVM had an outstanding match, taking first and second in each event. In the vaulting exercise, UVM's Anne Berry captured first place with a point total of 8.35. Teammates Ann Hayes and Kim Myette followed in second and third respectively? Karen Esckilsen's 4.65 score in the balance beam event, earned her first place. Close behind with 4.6 points was Kim Myette in second, and in fourth place Pam Foss with 4.1. It was another first for Anne Berry in the floor exercises. She was followed by teammates Ann Hayes in second and Kim Myette in sixth. Kim Chung excelled in her performance on the uneven parallel bars. Her score of 6.25 put her well out of reach of UVM's Ginny Scott (2nd, 5.5) and Anne Berry (3rd, 4.45). UVM won the meet 71.60 to Plymouth's 58.30.

Lastly, UVM's Women's A and B swim teams enjoyed their invitational meet. UVM A took the meet with 119.5 points, followed by Plattsburgh State University (100.5), Green Mountain College (93.5), and UVM B (25.5). Several pool and varsity records were broken in the meet. Laura Schriesheim proved to be valuable for the winning cause taking first in both the 50 and 100 yd. breaststroke, as well as being a member of the winning 200 yd. medley relay. In her last meet, graduating senior, Andrea Kalisch exhibited her ability at butterfly. Her performance included a first in the 100 yd. butterfly, and also swimming the butterfly leg of the winning medley relay.

Cat's Edge St. Mike's In Cliff Hanger

by Norm Robinson

The University of Vermont basketball team went up against an inspired St. Michael's team Tuesday night and escaped by the skin of their teeth with a 77-73 win over the Purple Knights. Coach Salzberg remarked, "We felt we were fortunate to come out alive. St. Mike's played a great game and they were ready for us."

The Purple Knights were indeed ready for Vermont as they stormed out to a 8-0 lead with John Balczuk pouring in six of his game high 25 points.

Vermont came storming right back with 13 unanswered points as Ron Gottscalk and Warren Prehmus got 11 of those points to lead the way.

The rest of the half saw the teams exchange baskets and the scoring eventually ended in a 34-34 halftime tie.

The Cats did not move the ball well in the early going and that, combined with the torrid shooting of Balczuk caused problems for Vermont. Poor foul shooting hurt both clubs as St. Mike's coach Walter Bauman attested. "Thirteen for twenty-four at the foul line is not St. Mike's. We did a great job on the boards and we played a great game."

A total of 37 fouls were called in the contest as both sides were mixing it up underneath. The officiating was questionable to say the least. In this reporter's eyes they appeared inconsistant and once they didn't even know who they had called a foul on.

The second half saw Jose Quinones score 13 points, many of them early as he and Balczuk led the Knights to a 48-41 lead with 15 minutes left.

The Cats began to come back as Kevin Kelly and Sam Copeland hit for some key points. Kelly got several key rebounds and Vermont cut the lead to 56-54 on a drive by Kelly and suddenly the defense came alive for Vermont.

"We were going to go into a four corner offense, which we eventually did because we couldn't get anything. We wanted to break their defense and we did a couple of times but we missed a couple of high percentage shots", said Bauman.

Mark Sobolewski played his greatest game for Vermont and he tied the score at 60 apiece with seven and a half minutes left. Junior guard Warren Prehmus hit for five straight points to give the Cats the lead for good. Prehmus' experience was crucial down the stretch.

"We wanted Warren to handle the ball late in the game because he can control it so well. Kevin Kelly does the same thing for us", remarked Salzberg.

"The Knights began to go after Warren so we brought Kevin out from underneath to help out and he did a great job."

St. Michael's closed to 72-71 with a minute and a half left but Kelly got a key layup to make it 74-71 and Sobolewski hit a foul shot to give the Cats a four point lead with 19 seconds left.

Blaczuk hit one for the Knights o cut it to 75-73, but Kelly's inbound pass went the length of the court to Gottschalk and Ron missed his original shot but tipped in the rebound to salt it away for the Catamounts.

Vermont was out rebounded for the first time this season and was also out shot, but their defense was the key to the win. Mike Alston had a good game for St. Mike's as they were missing the services, more or less, of Ted Mauro. Mauro, one of St. Mike's better players has been hurt and saw only very limited action.

The Catamount's point guard, Mark Cubit was out with a throat infection and Greg Davis stepped in and did an admirable job bringing the ball downcourt and pressing the Knight's guards. Big Ken Johnson was held to 11 points which was a big reason for the Vermont win,

The high points for Vermont were many. Ron Gottschalk and Warren Prehmus had 16 points each, and Prehmus played a fine defensive game as well. Kevin Kelly and Sam Copeland each netted 12 points, while Mark Sobolewski scored a career high 14 points.

The Knight's came to play, and the game could have gone either way if not for crucial turnovers late in the game and the outstanding ball handling of Prehmus and Kelly.

Vermont is now 4-1 on the year and will meet Ohio State Saturday. They will meet St. Josephs, Darmouth and Plattsburgh at home over the Christmas break as well as several away games.

SLU Tumbles Icecats, 5-3

The University of Vermont hockey team failed for the seventh time in their quest for their first win of the season, when St. Lawrence University poured in three third period goals to come from behind and defeat the Cats, 5-3.

The Catamounts did everything but win, and had a statistical edge in shots and a huge advantage in territorial play. Vermont had a 49-31 margin in shots but the SLU goaltender, Harry Aikens came up with an outstanding performance.

The Cats jumped out to a 1-0 lead when Randy Koch's shot slid along the ice and eluded Aikens.

St. Lawrence notted the score on a power play goal when Doug Crawford flipped the puck into a wide open net. Crawford's goal came when Kevin Dougherty took a shot that McNamara stopped, but the rebound came right to the waiting Crawford.

The second period saw a goal apiece for each team. SLU took a 2-1 lead when Ken Brousseau hit a lazy slider that Jeff Dillion redirected past McNamara.

[illegible] Hill made it 2-2 when he [illegible] the puck over a sprawled Aikens after he stopped a Tom Colby shot.

Vermont came out flying in the final stanza, and at 6:04 Hill gave Vermont a 3-2 lead.

Aikens tried to break up a Vermont play, but Colby's shot glanced off the goalie to the open Hill, who banged it into the empty net.

Once again Vermont penalties hurt when Dave Adams stuffed the puck past McNamara on a power play goal.

Dillon put the saints ahead to stay when he backhanded the puck past McNamara after a mele in front.

The final SLU goal came when Dougherty sent the puck up the boards to Kyle Smith who had just come on after a penalty. Smith moved in alone against McNamara and slid the puck behind the UVM goalie.

Vermont, now 0-7 and 0-4 in Division I meets Norwich tonight and Clarkson on Friday. The Cats need to turn things around very soon and the Norwich game may be the start.

Stubburn UNH Falls To Vermont

by Norm Robinson

Behind the hot second half shooting of Warren Prehmus, and the steady performances of Sam Copeland and Kevin Kelly, the University of Vermont basketball team fought off a stubborn UNH squad to win 74-63.

Vermont did not play well at all phases of the game at any one point. Coach Salzberg said "at times we played good team offense."

"Our players know how to rebound. They're physically capable of it, but they didn't."

New Hampshire ran off to a quick 11-5 lead, behind the shooting of their outstanding guard, Wayne Morrison. The Lexington, Mass. native got three quick baskets in the Wildcat surge, and Vermont looked erratic.

Kevin Kelly got the Cats going when he hit for six points in less than a minute-and-a-half. Kelly had the crowd standing on their feet when he drove the baseline on Tom Cavanaugh for a twisting one-hand lay-up to make it 11-7, UNH.

After Mark Cubit hit one, Kevin pulled an instant replay to knot the game at eleven.

The rest of the half saw Steve Singchais and Morrison leading the charge for the deliberate Wildcats. The Catamounts were not rebounding well, and were having their problems shooting as well. Sam Copeland put Vermont ahead to stay on a great individual effort. Copeland put up a shot, which missed but following his shot, he tapped it up twice before finally connecting to make it 19-17.

Copeland is a man that is 6-3 but plays like he is 6-7. His unbelievable jumping ability reminds Vermonters of Bernie Palmer.

The half ended with Vermont leading 31-30 after Morrison hit a long bomb just at the buzzer.

Vermont pulled out to a 35-32 lead when Prehmus went to work. The Cat guard hit on a jumper, a lay-up and two more jump shots to extend the lead to 43-35.

Charlie Trapani began to hit the boards for Vermont, and the inspired play of Kelly continued to keep the Cats on top. Kevin dove to the floor for a loose ball, and moments later hit on one of his patented twisting lay-ups.

Singelais kept the Wildcats close with six quick points to cut the lead to 55-47, but UNH could never get any closer.

"It was not a very good game for us, we have to be happy that we won," said Salzberg.

"Defensively, that was what won the game for us. There was no one area that we executed well, at times we were good."

New Hampshire coach Gerry Friel felt that the Wildcats played very well in the first half but "our inability to make our foulshots hurt us."

"That and the fact that UVM took us out of our offense hurt."

UVM's press broke down the New Hampshire style of play, and was the ultimate reason Vermont won.

Prehmus was high scorer for Vermont with 17 points, while Kelly, Ron Gottschalk, and Copeland had 12, 12, and 11 respectively. For New Hampshire, Singelais had 18, while Morrison tallied 16 for the Wildcats.

Volleyball Brings Season To A Close

by K. Honza

Action this past weekend of the women's "B" volleyball team brought the season to a close. On December 6, the "B" squad participated in a tri-meet with Castleton State College and Siena College (N.Y.) at Castleton. In the double elimination series, the "B" squad was defeated by the Castleton varsity, 15-4, 15-7. However, in the second match the team recovered, downing Siena 15–3, 15–11. The third and final match once again saw UVM again facing the Castleton squad. Although they lost to the strong Castleton team, it was not an easy victory for Castleton. Castleton won 15–9, 15–10.

Reviewing the 1975 season... The "A" team finished the season with a respectable record of 7–3. The Freshman–Sophomore squad shows great promise for next year. Spikers Joy Cahow, Alice Lajoie, Connie Angulo and Belinda Emerson and setters Mary Shakespeare and Chelsea Wallace should all be returns. The "B" squad was made up mostly of inexperienced players, but Coach Sciller feels they "showed great skill improvement over the course of the short season." She feels that Dianne Boettcher, Penny Bolio, and Diane Vandreil will all be challengers for the "A" squad next year. With the loss of only two seniors, Yvonne Quist and Gail Robinson the teams all look forward to the 1976 season, which will include such teams as U. Mass, URI, Keene State, Bates, U.Maine, Portland and UNH.
